Mr. Wilshire: No, I would not. When I asked the hon. Gentleman about £17 million-worth of cuts in my constituency, he said that he did not know the position there. Similarly, I do not know the position in Chesham and Amersham, but I stress that the whole of the south-east suffers the same problems and I have no doubt that a Buckinghamshire Member of Parliament would recount that their local health services face the same difficulties caused by having to pay bills and provide services with the money that the Government give them.

Mr. Lansley: If the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) had been present in Westminster Hall three weeks ago, he would have heard Members of Parliament from Buckinghamshire making the same point about the unfairness of the financial distribution in the NHS and the deficits in Buckinghamshire.

Mr. Wilshire: That is no surprise. Every time I talk to a colleague from the south-east, I hear the same story.

Mr. Luff: I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) made that very point at Prime Minister's Question Time last week, and the same complaint as my hon. Friend makes now.

Mr. Wilshire: I must read Hansard afterwards. I am sure that that would give the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) and me the answers that we need.

My trust is breaking the law by overspending by £17 million. The Christmas before last, the position became so bad that suppliers refused to supply the trust until it paid its bills. That is what the Government have done to a trust that tries to provide the services that my constituents want. Their response to the new crisis is not that that the Chancellor boasts about. Given the amount of taxpayers' money that the Chancellor claims to be giving away, one would have believed that we might get some of it. But no, all we have is a loan of £14 million so that we no longer break the law. I must emphasise that the amount loaned is £14 million, not £17 million. There is also a little sting in the tail in that if my trust is good, does what the Government order it to do and makes cuts, keeps quiet and does not complain, the Government will convert the loan into a grant. However, they will do that only if the trust makes the cuts.

Last September, another interesting development occurred. The Government trumpeted the creation of diagnostic treatment centres—I believe that that name has subsequently been changed. They claimed that that would mean new facilities, more staff and more treatment—the usual spin that we get from the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Health. They told me that a company called Mercury Healthcare would open such a centre at Ashford. We then discovered why it was that the Government want services moved out of Ashford—so that the Government can privatise part of it. It occurred to me that that amounted to certain hypocrisy, because Labour Members are always accusing my party of wanting to privatise the NHS, but in my constituency the Government are trying to privatise part of the NHS.

To get to the bottom of this curious development, I thought I would ask Mercury Healthcare all about the new facilities, extra staff and extra treatment on offer. I was dumbfounded when I discovered the truth. Mercury Healthcare is not going to provide any new facilities. It is going to take over one of the wards that has been emptied out by the cuts that the Government have ordered to be made. It is going to take over the theatre, which will no longer be used by the NHS, as the patients have been moved somewhere else. Mercury Healthcare is not even going to employ anyone extra, because it intends to take over the staff that the Government have freed up at my hospital. So much for the spin and the boast about using the private sector to do more, to do it more quickly and to provide better facilities. It is just not true. NHS wards, NHS theatres and NHS staff are to be privatised by this Government, and they have the nerve to accuse us of wanting to do that.

Just after Christmas, somebody within the trust had a little word with me and said, "Have you asked how the Government's plans to produce this treatment centre are going." I said, "No." I therefore made some inquiries. What did I discover? They had got rid of Mercury Healthcare. I have tabled question after question since, and the Government refuse to tell me when they broke off the negotiations or why. All that they do is point me towards yet another press release, which was issued on 17 February this year. What does it say? Surprise, surprise, five more treatment centres will be opened by the Government, to provide new facilities. Who will run them? Mercury Healthcare—the company sacked from Ashford. The Government take them off one job, put them on another, and claim that they have provided extra centres. That is the spin—that is the way in which this Government act. That is what happens when the Chancellor gets to the Dispatch Box. He tells a tale which he hopes that people will fall for, but they will not when they know the truth.

Just as a little footnote, the Government still hope to have a privatised facility at Ashford. They still want to get rid of a ward and to get rid of the theatres. They still want to hand over some NHS staff, but now they want to hand them over to a private Swedish company. That is the reality of privatisation—they cannot even use British; they give away their facilities to somebody from abroad.

The reality of the NHS for my constituents is as I describe it, not as the Chancellor claims. The reality is suffering—let us remember that an A and E consultant said that it may even result in death—not what the Secretary of State claims. As a result of this Budget, and as a result of this Government, my constituents are facing cuts in spending, not more spending. They are facing cuts in services, not improved services. To add insult to injury, they are facing the privatisation of their NHS.

Last Thursday we were treated to the usual round of spin, boasts, claims—all the false things that we have come to associate with a Government who cannot distinguish reality from fiction. Tonight, like it or not, the Government must face the truth—the truth as my constituents see it: the truth that led 12,000 local people to sign a petition pleading with the Government not to make cuts. There seems to be no sign whatever, at least at the moment, that the Government are paying any attention to that petition. From them it is all spin and no delivery; all waffle, and a complete refusal to listen to my constituents or provide them with a decent NHS.

9.5 pm

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): This may be the only thing I shall have in common with the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) this evening, but like him, I must begin by apologising for being unable to be present for the whole debate. I had other work commitments earlier.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on the commitments that he announced earlier. I note that rather than supporting those advances, the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) wants to proceed against the non-medical staff in our national health service. I am not sure that I want a health service bereft of security staff: sadly, we need them to protect our nurses nowadays. I do not particularly want to make grand savings by wiping out gardeners in our hospital grounds. I think that medical secretaries do a useful job, indeed an essential one. I think that computer programmers and technicians are crucial to the NHS. By all means let us phase out jobs that we no longer need, but let us not kid ourselves about the people whom the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds has in his sights.

It seems to me that the test of a party's attitude to the NHS is what it does in government. Given the official Opposition's track record, their ever-changing commitments and the constant mantra that their promises are no more than work in progress, it is hardly surprising that many of us have adopted scepticism bordering on cynicism.

I welcome the Budget, which, as the Chancellor rightly pointed out, hails one of the country's longest sustained periods of growth. I am proud to be a member of a party whose Government can boast the lowest inflation for 30 years and the lowest unemployment since 1973. Despite all attempts by those with a very different agenda to paint an altogether different picture, I am delighted that our Chancellor has ensured that our debt is the lowest of any in the G7 industrialised economies. When I think of what the situation was like when I worked with unemployed youngsters in the late 1970s and early 1980s, I know that this country has been transformed. At that time in the west midlands, it was a novelty to meet a kid who had a father in work—or even a male relative who had had a chance to work.

Of course there are challenges ahead. There are currently 555,000 vacancies in the economy. We cannot ignore the investment in higher education and skills training that the Governments of India and China are pouring into their economies. I welcome the Chancellor's announcements about education generally, but I particularly welcome the proposals for a new deal for skills and the 10-year framework for investment in the UK's science and innovation base.

There is an area in which I think we might do a bit more. I want to focus briefly on energy, and renewables and carbon dioxide emissions. It is not clear to me that the Budget has paid quite the attention to those matters that some of us might have hoped. In this country, every year, an estimated 600,000 tonnes of coal mine methane seeps into the air from around 1,000 abandoned or disused former coal mines. That state of affairs, I am told, could continue for the next 50 to 100 years. Coal mine methane has a global warming potential 23 times greater than that of CO_2. Capturing coal mine methane and converting it to electricity reduces global warming potential and CO_2 emissions by nine times more per kilowatt generated than can be achieved by wind power.

Why, one may ask, is that area of the renewables market not at the forefront of our energy thinking? The answer is that many companies simply cannot afford it in today's cut-throat, competitive energy market. However, a small shift in the renewables obligation could change all that, and it seems strange that that does not happen given that methane captured from landfill sites or sewage farms is covered by that process. The German Government, I understand, included coal mine methane in their renewables legislation. It could be helpful in terms of energy, reducing emissions and the cost to the health of communities, if I could persuade colleagues at the Treasury to have another look at that.

Paul Farrelly: I did not expect to intervene on the subject of coal mine methane in a health debate but I suppose that there is a health spin-off. I remember my dad converting from methane—the old town gas—to North sea gas years ago. Does my hon. Friend agree, notwithstanding his point about coal mine methane, that it is different from coal bed methane, and that we do not want a lot of mining companies trampling over virgin greenfield land trying to tap into seams of coal under the ground, as they tried to do in north Staffordshire after stripping assets out of local pits?

Mr. McCabe: My understanding is that, although health has served as part of the focus for the debate, it is an economic debate on the Budget and we are relatively free to range across subjects, but I take his point. What he describes would be entirely unacceptable and bears no relationship to the matter that I was describing, which is about trying to recycle coal mine methane in order to produce electricity and in so doing relieve the stress on the environment. I am grateful to him for making that point.

I am aware that the Budget has been well received in a great many quarters. School teachers in my constituency have told me about their plans to build on the progress that they have been able to make. They are already describing equipment that they will purchase and renew. They are already planning what to do for children in the years ahead. People who work in the skills and training sector are already looking forward to what we can do to develop and boost areas of our economy in which we have real difficulties and deficiences.

I understand that the director general of the Confederation of British Industry has welcomed the Budget. I noticed that not too many Members on the Opposition Benches referred to that today. Of course, pensioners know the difference between what is really in their pockets and what they have a real guarantee of receiving, and promises that are ever out of reach.

There is really only one obvious place where the Budget has not been welcome: the Opposition Benches. Rather than acknowledging demands for education, training and investment, rather than celebrating the low level of Government debt compared with that of our G7 partners and rather than congratulating the Chancellor on helping this country to avoid the recessions that have done so much damage to the American and Japanese economies and to those in the eurozone, Opposition Members have insisted that this is a Budget that we cannot afford.

I have listened with fascination for some time now to the arguments advanced by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and by the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). They like to tell us that they are changed men—new men, as one of them suggested earlier today: the right hon. and learned Gentleman would like us to forget all about his past.

Paul Farrelly: Is my hon. Friend puzzling, like me, about the real agenda behind Conservative policies? I shall quote what the current chairman of the Conservative party has said about reconstruction:

"As one of, I think, the unreconstructed Thatcherite free-marketeers in the shadow cabinet, I'm a great believer genetically in markets . . . The biggest problem that we have in the NHS is that it is not a proper market."

Does my hon. Friend agree that the choice that the Budget poses is Labour investment in the NHS or Conservative cuts and wholesale privatisation of the NHS?

Mr. McCabe: I am certainly not puzzled. I could not agree more with those comments.

The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe would like us to forget about his past; but, I remember, as do millions of others, what happened to the economy of the west midlands the last time a Conservative Government implemented the policies that the official Opposition now advocate. I have heard the Tories telling us that people are best at deciding how best to spend their tax money, but I remember that Lady Thatcher, as she now is, boasted in 1979 that income tax was too high and that the Conservatives would reduce it and pick up the lost revenues by indirect taxes. That is exactly what they did. It is true that the Conservatives reduced income tax when they came to power in 1979, but in their first Budget, VAT on what were then called luxury items rose from 12.5 per cent. to 15 per cent. and VAT on everything else rose from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent.—virtually double. That is how they believe in people spending their own money.

Mr. Lansley: While the hon. Gentleman is talking about income tax and VAT, perhaps he would like to tell the House and, in turn, his constituents that the Chancellor expects to increase the take on income tax by £15 billion and the revenue from VAT by £10 billion in the next financial year—so there will be more taxes and more taxes again from the Chancellor.

Mr. McCabe: I have no problem with increasing the tax yield in an expanding economy. I do not know anyone, other than the hon. Gentleman, who would find that a problem. The way that the Conservatives trust people to spend their money is by creating the illusion of tax cuts by banging up the VAT rate. That is what they did in 1979, when they also taxed sickness and unemployment benefits and doubled the cost of NHS prescriptions. In their second Budget, they doubled the cost of prescriptions again. While they were doing all that to the British people, they cut public spending on education, schools, health, transport, housing and most other areas. In fact, they cut spending on anything that really mattered. That is the real record, but the Tories talk about affordability and waste. In fact, they were so successful in 1980 that their second Budget was described as the meanest by any Chancellor since 1931.

What was the effect of that great Tory approach? It was the collapse of industries like a set of dominoes right across the west midlands. We were plunged into recession and millions were thrown out of work. Senior managers and factory floor workers were all the same. Many never worked again, and their sons and daughters became the generation who lived in the workless twilight zone of Tory Britain—a generation purged of opportunity and condemned to be the victims of economic madness, Tory obsessions and Tory prejudice.

Alistair Burt: I am deeply moved by what the hon. Gentleman says but, if that is the case, why on earth did his constituents not vote for socialism at the past two elections? Why do those on the Government Front Bench parade a modern mixed economy? Why do they talk about all the reforms that the Conservative Government introduced on which the Chancellor is now basing the success of his economy? What happened to the socialism that the hon. Gentleman is spouting about? It never worked and never appeared—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. This is meant to be an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. McCabe: The hon. Gentleman should be deeply moved, but he appears to have missed the fact that my constituents and the British public voted in the last two elections for economic sanity as opposed to the economic madness that they suffered under him and his lot, and would do again. At the time that the Tories were doing all that to the British people, they were boasting that it was a price worth paying. I say any price is worth paying to avoid going back to those desperate years.

My experience and that of most of my constituents and a whole generation in the west midlands tells us that cheap soundbites about credit card Budgets are nothing more than a cover for cuts, recession and untold misery at the very time that we need investment, expansion and growth. That is why I am clear that there is only one man capable of delivering on the British economy. That is why I am delighted to back this Budget.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am entertained by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe); I enjoy listening to him. He was at risk of speaking in a way that was interesting and that reflected a certain amount of expertise. The problem is that that was restricted to his discussion of coal mine methane. Everything else was neither interesting nor displayed any expertise whatever.

Still less did the hon. Gentleman's remarks have anything to do with health. Of course, he was right to say that he was free to talk about other issues, but it is surprising that so few Labour Members have sought to talk about health. Presumably, in Cabinet, the Secretary of State sought a debate on health because he saw it as a priority issue for the Government. However, Labour Members did not agree with him. Thirteen speeches have been made by Back Benchers; nine of them were made by Conservative Members and all but one—I shall return to that point in a minute—spoke about the substance of the issue of health and with experience of their constituencies. Just four Labour Members made speeches and only three of them spoke about health. Apart from the speech of their Front-Bench spokesman, what was the Liberal Democrat contribution? Nothing.

I am used to Conservatives winning the argument, but I normally expect the Government at least to mount an argument. However, they did not even do that; they simply caved in. They hope that no one is out there watching and that no one cares whether Parliament debates the Budget—still less debates health. Now, for once, we have it on the record that we care about health and what is happening to the NHS. We care about the health experience of our constituents, and we are prepared to debate the substance of the issue.

Let me say a few words about the Secretary of State's speech. He was invited to blame his predecessor for the current situation and verged on doing so—we are pleased that his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), is with us and that he contributed to the debate—but in truth, he actually blames his predecessor but one. He made that perfectly obvious when he said that the Government made a start on remedying what they saw as the failings of the NHS with the NHS plan in July 2000. Everything that came before that represented two or three years of completely wasted time—although we have had pretty much six years of wasted time from the Government.

The Secretary of State made one or two points of substance to which I want to respond. He talked about the additional money in the Budget that is intended for clinical research, which I welcome. As chair of the all-party group on stroke, I welcome the fact that he has included stroke among the three diseases—Alzheimer's, stroke and diabetes—on which there will be an additional emphasis on clinical research. I hope that he and his colleagues will ensure that research on stroke is directed not only at the disease itself, but at rehabilitation and how we can best achieve that.

If I may digress for a moment, it is interesting to note the lack of research on stroke compared with the main diseases of cancer and coronary heart disease, so the announcement is extremely timely. We need to begin to understand better the circumstances in which we could intervene early during stroke management and stem the extent of the disease. In the past, we tended to say that if people have a stroke, they are admitted, and that if we are lucky, they are admitted to a specialist stroke unit. Perhaps the Government will be able to tell us at the end of next week how many people are admitted to specialist stroke units. Unfortunately, the figure will not be 100 per cent., which ought to be the target in the national service framework for older people.

In the past, we tended to say that the degree of disability and deficit that results from a stroke is pretty much fixed and that the effects can be mitigated only through rehabilitation. However, in the future—perhaps research will enable us to identify this—we may be able to use new treatments such as Desmosteplase, which is in use and licensed in America. Although imaging is required for such treatments, their use in early intervention tends to reduce the extent of stroke deficit. Tens of thousands of people are affected by stroke each year and we might be able to reduce the extent of their disease. I welcome the research on stroke. When we discuss health, it is important to talk about health issues rather than only funding and how much money should go where, which is why I welcomed what the Secretary of State said.

The Secretary of State briefly mentioned drugs for children. I commend the work carried out before the 1997 election by the Select Committee on Health under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe). The Committee published reports on children's health just prior to that election, one of which drew specific attention to the lack of clinical trials of such drugs, and especially the lack of drugs for which there were protocols on, and indications of, the extent to which they were suitable to be prescribed to children. It is important to begin to remedy the problem so that we have greater confidence in the system.

I reiterate the point of principle on which our approach to the NHS is based, which my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) set out: it should be free at the point of use and based on need, not on the ability to pay. The Secretary of State retreated in confusion on that point. He argued at the Dispatch Box that we should spend more in the private sector than my hon. Friend suggested.

Dr. John Reid: There is no confusion. I ask a question to which I did not get an answer—perhaps the hon. Gentleman can enlighten us. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) insisted that the Conservative party is committed to equity of access. How can two people have equal access to an operation if that is dependent on them both having half the cost of the operation?

Mr. Lansley: The Secretary of State misses the point again. We have made it clear that the patients passport will be a mechanism for the delivery of patient empowerment. It will give patients control over their health care. It is astonishing that he does not understand when he is playing grandmother's footsteps with the Conservative party.

At the Conservative party conference in Harrogate two or so weeks ago, my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk made it clear, just as we made it clear at our last party conference that we wish to extend the patients passport to chronic disease management, that we are starting work on how we will achieve that, as he reiterated today. It involves placing particular emphasis on diabetes and asthma, as early diseases that would qualify for that approach, and empowering patients to control their health care. That happened on the Saturday. Lo and behold, the following Thursday, the Secretary of State went to a conference organised by The Guardian—the type of event to which he tends to go—and announced that he intends to focus on chronic disease management and self-management of such diseases, with an emphasis on diabetes and asthma. We are forging the way in the health debate.

The Secretary of State needs to persuade his hon. Friends of his policies. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) spent most of his speech attacking the concept of patient empowerment. He is not interested in the idea that someone might choose the type of health care that they receive and where they receive it. He wants the money spent in his local hospital and does not want anyone to choose anything else.

Paul Farrelly rose—

Mr. McCabe rose—

Mr. Lansley: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme, because I just referred to him.

Paul Farrelly: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's return to the Front Bench. He was a talent wasted on the Back Benches. I also know him to be a reasonable man. Does he truly believe in the voucher, the visa or the passport policy, or is it something that he inherited?

Mr. Lansley: Before the hon. Gentleman chides me on policy, he should find out about his party's policy, because the Government have been chasing us. For heaven's sake, it is his party's policy increasingly to use the private sector. The Government have been buying services at 143 per cent. of the NHS cost. According to the The Times today, they are negotiating for bulk purchasing in the private sector. We want independent health care providers to stand alongside NHS providers. Our interest is in ensuring that patients get the health care they need and not to be hide-bound by an idea of who provides it, whether it is NHS owned or independent.

The detail of the Government's plans often reveals that choice is limited. Rather than providing choice at the point of referral, it is choice after six months. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk said, it is not a choice of any hospital across the country—a genuinely national health service—but a choice of the specific hospitals that the Government say people can go to. My hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) told us about his constituents who were not allowed to be referred to the Royal Surrey County, even though that was their choice. Just as this Government did away with extra-contractual referrals and out-of-area treatments, and have introduced limited choice within the NHS, only a Conservative Government will restore choice to my hon. Friend's constituents.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I have only a few minutes left and the Liberal Democrats did not participate in the debate to any extent.

The right hon. Member for Darlington made some important points. I want to mention just one—his conversion to increasing home ownership, as one of my hon. Friends put it. Given the right hon. Gentleman's record at the Department of Health, surely he could help to shift the definition of affordable housing away from a definition of social housing, which is geared to the rented sector and, in particular, the housing association-owned rented sector, to one that offers opportunities of equity stakes for those in key-worker housing. That would be enormously helpful. That is what people around Addenbrooke's hospital in my area want. They do not want to rent. They want the opportunity to buy, and if they cannot buy the whole of a property, they want to have some equity in it.

I must not be too unfair: the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) did make a speech. He talked about our policies, but he neglected, so far as I could tell, to say anything about Liberal Democrat policies. In particular, he neglected to tell anybody that the Liberal Democrats appear to be opposed to patient choice, but he did talk about public health.

The Secretary of State did not talk about public health very much. In particular, he did not give us the opportunity to ask him why he supposes that, in a recent survey of doctors published in "BMA News", 78 per cent. of those who responded said that they were not confident that the Government could or would achieve significant improvements in public health. That is exactly why my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk and other colleagues put improvements and a new strategy for public health at the forefront of our policies—there is no confidence in the Government on that matter.

Mrs. Calton: One thing that the hon. Gentleman failed to note is that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) asked where the £1 billion of dead money for the patients passport is. I should be grateful for an answer.

Mr. Lansley: I should be glad to answer the hon. Lady, who at least had the patience to listen to the whole debate, but I confess that I do not remember the hon. Gentleman saying that. I must have been in the midst of a rather dull debate. Since the hon. Gentleman had nothing to say about his own policy, however, I shall not bother to say too much. If the hon. Lady wants to chide us about policies, she might like to remind the House that in the debate on foundation hospitals she was against the principle of those hospitals, but when challenged on the fact that in her constituency she supported Stockport district general hospital, which I have visited, in becoming a foundation trust, she said, "Well, of course, in the Liberal Democrats, one changes one's principles according to the circumstances."

Mrs. Calton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I have given way to the hon. Lady once, and that is enough.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) told us a little about his views on the Budget, which should worry the Chancellor because, basically, that consisted of agreeing with the Chancellor that his borrowing an enormous amount of money was a good thing and, if there was one criticism, it was that he was not going to put the price of alcohol up by 10 per cent. I am not sure how that will go down in Scotland, and with the Scotch Whisky Association.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) departed from the subject of health to tell us some very important things about biofuels. If I may, I will simply say that, from my perspective in East Anglia, I share her view of the importance of giving credibility to the Government's acceptance of the EU biofuels directive and their commitment to 2 per cent. biodiesel by 2005, and the necessity of showing how those targets will be achieved.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) told us about Derriford hospital and went into the subject of payment by result, which I hope Ministers will take note of. I must confess, however, that I would be surprised if she got much of a reception among her colleagues for her criticism of the market forces factor, since that is one of the components of a distribution factor that so benefits the constituencies of Labour Members as compared with the way in which NHS resources are distributed among Conservative Members' constituencies.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I do not have time. I must respond to the points made in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) made some very important points, and I want to echo two of them. The first was about the GP contract. I know from correspondence with Bedfordshire Heartlands PCT that it is concerned about where the money will come from. That concern has recently been reflected in "Health Press". The cost to the trust of running an out-of-hours service is to rise from £1 million to £1.9 million, and the Government's proposals, including the recent announcement by the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), will only take it to about £1.5 million, so it is looking at finding £400,000 from somewhere to maintain the service.

On a positive point, I shall not chide the Minister of State because I hope that he will be able to deliver for my hon. Friend on the subject of the Primrose appeal and the associated costs. I leave that with him. We will thank him if he is able to deliver satisfaction for the appeal by turning charitable donations not into tax but into the cancer centre for which they were subscribed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young)—[Interruption.] It is all very well the Secretary of State not listening to me speak—I am used to that—but neither he nor any of his colleagues at the Department of Health came to hear my right hon. Friend speak. They would have learned a great deal had they done so, and I recommend that they read his speech tomorrow, because it illustrated the problems that are being experienced in the areas represented by Conservative Members. Deficits of more than £20 million are reported in Hampshire and Isle of Wight strategic health authority and in the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority, and similar deficits are anticipated at the end of December in the Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire strategic health authority. Then—lo and behold—came the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) to say that no deficits were reported in his area. Well, that is a surprise. I wonder how that happened.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire also made it clear that the Secretary of State had managed to come to the Chamber and give a speech about health but not talk about all the things that people working in the health services are talking about. They are talking about NHS IT, GP contracts, consultants' contracts, the European working time directive, payment by results, the tariff, and foundation trusts, but the right hon. Gentleman mentioned none of those subjects. People in the NHS might wonder why he omitted them from his speech, but we do not. He missed out all those things because they are problems, and the Secretary of State did not come here to dwell on the problems. He came here to talk about our policies, not about his.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset spoke about the problems that his constituents are experiencing, and my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) referred to the European working time directive. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme—I am sorry to mention him again—spoke about Keele university and all the additional medical students training there. Well, good—they will be needed, because the BMA estimates that if Labour Members of the European Parliament, who voted to get rid of the opt-out from the working time directive, have their way, by 2009 we will need 9,900 more junior hospital doctors to cope with the demands of that directive. Those demands will hit us this August, and they are causing many in the NHS real concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) referred to relocation issues—I suppose that last Wednesday's announcement of 1,000 jobs to be lost to his area hit like a Titchfield thunderbolt. He also spoke about lack of accountability in planning and housing in the south-east and the east of England. I entirely share his view: that is a disgrace.

I have referred to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme sufficiently. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) reminded the House that only the Conservatives can offer the real structural reforms that are required. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) drew our attention to the tax increases that already appear in the Red Book, quite apart from the further tax increases that will be required if the evidence of revenue shortfalls and overruns in borrowing is accurate. My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) quoted personal experience of the effects on the NHS in his constituency, which comes within the North West London strategic health authority—

Mr. Wilshire: Surrey and Sussex.

Mr. Lansley: The Surrey and Sussex SHA, which also covers the constituency of our hon. Friend the Member for Reigate and which anticipates deficits of more than £20 million.

The debate was pretty much a walkover. We know what the link between the NHS and the Budget is. As my hon. Friend said, the Chancellor is in the casino; he is playing not with his own chips, but with ours, and he looks like he might lose. When he cannot manage the risks, who will take the losses? It will be the NHS that has to pay. Just as we have seen him do in the past, the Chancellor will make promises on which it is impossible for him to deliver. The Conservatives have the policies that will ensure that we can support the NHS with the resources that are required to improve health care to the standard that we need, and those resources will not be prejudiced by future demands for additional taxation or a collapse in the public finances. Only under the Conservatives can the NHS be safe.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): We have had a good debate. I shall do my best to deal with the points that have been raised in the time that is left to me, which will be less than the time that was available to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). I shall pay particular attention to those who contributed to the debate and still remain in the Chamber.

A central fact at the heart of the Budget statement and this debate is that since 1997 Britain has sustained growth through not one but two economic cycles. Since 2000, our growth has outperformed the EU area, Japan and even the United States. Since 1997, Britain is the only developed country that has grown in each and every quarter in spite of the recent world downturn, and in spite of our record, which was that Britain was usually first in and last out and suffered more in any world downturn that we experienced.

On Wednesday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed that last year the British economy grew by 2.3 per cent., meeting the Treasury's expectations and confounding the predictions of Opposition Members and many individual commentators. It was only in November 2003 that the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury said:

"There are now growing threats to growth and stability."

In April last year, the then shadow Chancellor and now Leader of the Opposition said:

"The Chancellor has misrepresented Britain's economic prospects in the past and he is now once again being less cautious than independent experts."

In addition to sustained growth, we have had the lowest inflation for 30 years, the lowest interest rates since 1955 and the lowest levels of unemployment since the 1970s. Britain is closer to full employment now than it has been for a generation. New unemployment figures published on the day of the Budget show that since 1997, 1.8 million extra jobs have been created in the British economy, with 1.3 million in the private sector.

This economic position is supported—it will continue to be supported—by the fiscal discipline that is at the heart of our strategy for long-term stability. We have met our fiscal rules. In addition, debt this year is just 33 per cent. of national income. Net borrowing is 2.4 per cent. of GDP and falling over the forecast period. Both figures are lower than in the past, and both are lower than the rates of our major competitors in the industrialised world. The challenge now is to combine this new confidence in Britain's economic potential with a new determination to make the long-term reforms and investment that will secure stability and growth for the future.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer set out in the Budget some of the necessary investments that we have to make in science, education, skills and enterprise in our country's wealth-creating and job-creating base. He made it clear that he will not neglect the need for long-term investment and will impose an annual balanced budget rule. A policy in contradiction of that, whether imposed by a future Government or by a rigid interpretation of the European stability and growth pact, would repeat the mistakes of Britain's stop-go past and put at risk our stability and growth. It would be a return to stop-go for the economy and a go-stop for public services. My right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) and the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) made the link between a sound economy and strong public services much clearer in their contributions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington said that health investment performs an economic function. He added that NHS reforms have delivered health benefits and economic benefits. He went on to say that the same is true in spades for education and child care. That is why the debate has been dominated by public service spending plans. At the same time, it is an essential part of the debate about Britain's economic management and prospects for the future.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) made what he termed an important announcement. He said that a future Tory Government would not introduce tax relief on private health care insurance. That is the unmistakeable sound of a hasty retreat. It is the unmistakeable sign of a policy that is at sixes and sevens. Neither the hon. Gentleman nor the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire answered the challenge of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when he asked, given the patient's passport plan, how could they honour the pledge that was made this afternoon that there would be equal access to all in the NHS, free at the point of delivery.

Let us be clear: the plans for health and the health passport would take money out of the NHS to subsidise the private health care industry. It would be used to help the privileged few to jump the queue. Most hard-working families could not afford the £8,000 that they would need to find for a heart bypass operation. They would not be able to find £5,500 for a knee operation, or £4,000 for a hip replacement operation. It is a plan to promote private health care and it would end an NHS free at the point of use—that is what the hon. Member for South Suffolk espoused as the new Conservative path.

Pupil passports were mentioned in the debate, and Conservative spokesmen are at sixes and sevens over that policy too. On 22 February, the shadow Chancellor said that the money for pupil passports could be used for "cheap private schools" and that parents could top it up. Over the next fortnight, that was confirmed, repudiated, reconfirmed and repudiated again. On 11 March, the shadow Chancellor ruled out using the passport at fee-paying schools. Five days later, the hon. Member for South Suffolk said that parents could spend the passport at fee-paying schools, but could not top it up. The policy has changed half a dozen times in half a dozen weeks, so can anyone be confident that it is not about to change again? It is clear, however, that money will be taken from mainstream schools to subsidise the private education sector and help the privileged few at the expense of every other pupil and student.

I shall pass over the contributions of the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, who is not in the Chamber, and of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) who, sadly, is no longer in his place. He welcomed the public investment, and I know that he will warn his constituents of the jeopardy to transport and the other things that he mentioned if the Opposition should ever assume office. The right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) takes a special interest in biofuels, and she makes sure that I do too. I appreciate her welcome for the Budget measures that she described as positive. I accept that she wants us to go further, but she will welcome the confirmation in the Budget that we are prepared to consider and consult on a biofuels obligation. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) will do so too, and I look forward to further representations from the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk and the all-party alliance that she has established.

The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) was poetic about the undisturbed peace in Biggleswade last week. I am glad that he welcomes the extension of the VAT scheme as a zero rate on the repairs of listed churches. He was concerned about the Macmillan Primrose appeal, and asked me to investigate. In recent months, I have been much more heavily involved in the issue than he might expect, and I can confirm that the Government have given a commitment that the NHS will meet the VAT costs of projects deemed to be priorities of local cancer networks.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) wanted a stronger link between NHS investment and improvements in the service—a point to which I shall return. He asked about photodynamic therapy for people with macular degeneration. I suspect that he knows that the National Institute for Clinical Excellence issued guidance in September, and in the same month the Department of Health issued guidance to vary the usual three-month funding directive because of the need both to expand services for those patients in a planned way and to recruit and train staff across the country.

The hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) raised the case of a constituent and funding for his treatment. It is impossible for me to respond, but I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends from the Department of Health will consider it, along with the comments of the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), who made a heated contribution about the position of his local NHS trust. The hon. Member for North Dorset complained about the operation of NHS Direct, but last year it received more than 6.3 million calls—almost three times the number of calls it received three years ago. Increasingly, it is gaining the support of patients and the medical professions, and it is part of the reformed service delivery that we need in future. He tried to use detailed figures to argue that the Budget showed that the Government will break the golden rule and that it confirmed tax rises in future.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) tried to do the same. I say to them both that precisely the opposite is true. We have kept every promise that we have made on tax and we will continue to do so. We have met the fiscal rules that we have set and will continue to do so. We have set out our commitments to invest more in public services. We have shown that they are fully funded, and they are fully funded on the cautious case that one would expect of a Government.

The hon. Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Bury St. Edmunds commented on productivity in the NHS. The definition of productivity is narrowly focused on what consultants do, and they make up only 7 per cent. of what the NHS does. I remind hon. Gentlemen that in March 1997 over 30,000 patients were waiting more than 12 months for treatment. At the end of January this year the figure was 36.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) mentioned coalmine methane, and I will consider the points that he made. I remind him that we have already exempted the generation of electricity from coalmine methane sources from the climate change levy, and we have put in place an unprecedented level and length of support to underpin the renewables obligation.

Despite the Opposition's efforts to run down the improvements, our past investment in health was demonstrated by the practical changes that my hon.

Friends the Members for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) and for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) described in their constituencies. Every Member of the House can see that progress is being made in their constituency. In my own area in South Yorkshire there are 1,170 more nurses attending to patients in the NHS now than there were in 1997. Our investment in health nationally has already led to an increase of 67,500 nurses and 19,000 doctors since 1997. We have funded the largest ever hospital building programme, improved GP premises, increased the number of beds and decreased waiting times for operations and emergency care. In answer to the hon. Members for Reigate and for North-East Bedfordshire, I point out that last year elective admissions increased 21 per cent. on 1997. That is equivalent to almost 1 million extra hospital admissions. That is no trifling increase in output, as the hon. Member for Reigate suggested.

In the Budget we have allocated an additional £100 million to NHS research and development. I am glad the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) welcomed that. Together with increases to the Medical Research Council, we expect the increase to exceed £150 million per year.

On education, we have announced in the Budget £8.5 billion extra for UK education in 2007–08 compared with 2005–06—an average annual increase of 4.4 per cent. in real terms across the 2004 spending review period. There will be more bad news for the education sector if the Tories get in. Andrew Neil asked the shadow Chancellor the day after the Budget whether he would match the extra spending on education. The answer:

"No, we'll stick with our plan."

We have outlined proposals to boost productivity and growth in the economy through a new deal for skills and a 10-year framework for investing in the UK's science and innovation base. Any serious debate in the House or in the country must set out these Labour commitments alongside the plans of the Opposition. The shadow Chancellor has made it clear that he would impose a two-year cash freeze, which means a 5 per cent. real-terms cut. We look forward to hearing how his Front-Bench colleagues will explain to local councils the projected cut of £2.4 billion, how they will explain to those who need child care the projected cut of £340 million, even before the new Budget announcements were taken into account, and how they will explain to those who are most impoverished and most needy across the globe, and to those who try to help them through international development, the projected cut of £229 million.

The shadow Chancellor has committed the Tories to 5 per cent. cuts in the law and order budget. That is the equivalent of sacking 1,300 police officers. At a time when we are stretched in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo, he has committed them to cut the defence budget by 5 per cent. in real terms. It is not just that they leave us defenceless at a time when we need defence, insecure when we need security and weak when we are in troubled times. It is worse than that. All the major investments we need for the future, they would cut. The very drivers of prosperity would be cut—science cut, skills cut, transport cut, apprenticeships cut, university places cut, further education courses cut and workplace training cut. This Budget and this Budget debate make clear the choice before the British people: cuts, charges and privatisation under the Tories—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Longlevens Post Office

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Paul Clark.]

10 pm

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester): There can be few occasions on which a Member of this House relishes being forced to rewrite his or her speech just hours before a debate. This, however, is such an occasion. It is also an occasion that has taught me something about the strength of this Chamber and of Adjournment debates, and about the difference that they can make. I have had to amend my speech several times during the day because of the negotiations that I have been in with the private sector today. I shall elaborate on that and on the effect of those discussions, which have been very positive with regard to issues that affect my constituency.

Five hours ago, my constituents in Longlevens were despairing at the prospect of losing their local post office. I shared their anger about the way in which they had been treated. I knew how important it was to save that vital service, so in recent weeks, I have worked with local people in Gloucester, organising petitions, meeting them in Parliament and even raising the matter with the Prime Minister two weeks ago in Prime Minister's Question Time.

This evening, we took several steps forward towards achieving a result, although we still have some way to go to resolve the issue totally. I would like to take this opportunity to explain the background to the situation, to discuss the points still to be resolved and to seek the Minister's advice on the wider issues raised by the recent controversy in Longlevens in my constituency. It is a controversy from which I believe that there is a great deal to learn, and my experience of today shows that some learning is going on at the present time as a consequence of the experience.

In recent years, it has become a commonplace that communication has been transformed somewhat by innovation. For many of us, air mail has been replaced by e-mail and the lick of a stamp has been superseded by the click of a mouse. In such circumstances, it can be all too easy to forget the importance of our local post offices. The residents of Longlevens in my constituency value their local post office enormously. Unfortunately, that service was recently put in great danger. The licence for the Longlevens branch has very recently been acquired by Tesco, which gave just three months' notice that it intended to close the branch to create more space in its local store. My constituents in Longlevens are unhappy about the way in which the decision was taken, and so indeed am I. I am also concerned about the wider implications of closing the post office in terms of the national picture, and I hope that the Minister will be able to elaborate on that point.

That is why my office and I were so pleased this evening when I received the latest fax from Tesco; I have had two faxes during the day. It has now said that it will not shut the post office on 8 May, as it had originally intended. It has made this promise:

"it will remain in the One Stop"

store

"while we search for a new location."

Of course, there is still much more to be done, and a new location in Longlevens must still be found, but I welcome this significant step forward by Tesco.

I shall elaborate on that letter, which contains three key concessions made today. First, Tesco says:

"Following our conversation earlier today . . . the resignation date of 8 May has been withdrawn."

I certainly welcome that.

Secondly, on a financial level, Tesco says:

"We understand that the cost of relocation may be deterring some of those who might consider taking on the relocated post office business. To overcome this, we have agreed with Post Office Ltd. an alternative arrangement whereby the contract transfers directly from Tesco to the new business. This would enable Tesco to significantly reduce the potential cost of relocation—we will not seek any goodwill payment for transferring the post office as a going concern and will contribute to the cost of physically relocating the post office."

I also welcome that.

Equally significantly, Tesco made a third concession hours before this debate, when it said:

"In order to maximise the opportunity for a post office to be transferred, it will remain in the One Stop"

shop

"while we search for a new location."

I welcome all three concessions.

It may help if I go into further detail about the issue in Gloucester. In January 2003, Tesco purchased the T and S Group, which owned 318 stores containing post offices nationally. Although it stated that it would retain many of those post offices, reports suggest that up to 100 of them could close. It promised that it would give six months' notice wherever possible before closing a post office. In the case of Longlevens, however, it decided that it would only give three months' notice.

I say to Tesco, "Why the rush?" Post Office Ltd. is due to publish its area plan in the third quarter of this calendar year detailing the need for local post office provision in Gloucester. Tesco pre-empted the plan by deciding to close Longlevens before it saw what the plan had to say. It also failed to seek the views of local people, who were utterly dismayed by the total lack of consultation. Indeed, the public interest did not seem to feature in its initial calculations.

In my view, that is evidence of a wider lack of strategic thinking about the future of post offices in Gloucester and a lack of effective co-operation between Post Office Ltd. and Tesco. This incident, and others like it, threatens to undermine the Post Office Ltd. urban reinvention programme. Under the programme, the Oxstalls branch, which is also in Longlevens, was recently closed. Since Longlevens is just 0.9 miles away from the Oxstalls branch, it was subsequently designated as a "receiving branch", but now it, too, is threatened by closure, and its future remains uncertain. Post Office Ltd. is obliged to ensure adequate provision for customers in this area. If two neighbouring branches close within months, how can that obligation possibly be kept? The simple answer is that it cannot.

The closure seems to have surprised Post Office Ltd. as much as it surprised me and, indeed, everybody else. The situation could be exacerbated further because of uncertainty about the future of the nearby Barnwood post office. A planning application has been submitted that would involve the Barnwood site being knocked down to build flats. The operator of a nearby filling station has, however, indicated its willingness to take on the post office in Barnwood on its own site, but it is reluctant to do so until Post Office Ltd. has clarified its views on the future of services in the area plan, which will not be ready until autumn this year.

As a consequence of that, it is not inconceivable that one 12-month period could see the closure of Oxstalls, Longlevens and Barnwood post offices, resulting in a massive gap in post office provision in the north and north-east of my constituency. If one draws an imaginary circle with a 1-mile diameter around the Barnwood post office, as I have, one will see that the community that it serves includes part of the Elmbridge and Longlevens communities, which would be hit again.

In those circumstances, it is not surprising that the local community in Longlevens has come together in opposition to the plan. I cannot overemphasise to my hon. Friend the Minister how strongly local people feel about this. Thousands have signed petitions such as those organised by me and by The Citizen newspaper, and many more have phoned BBC Radio Gloucestershire, particularly the Mark Cummings mid-morning show—all calling on Tesco to think again. Tesco's letter demonstrates that it has listened, to some extent, and I welcome the dialogue that it now seems willing to take part in.

The closure of any post office will cause unhappiness among its users, but I think that I have shown that the situation in Longlevens is particularly serious. Since neither you, Mr. Speaker, nor my hon. Friend the Minister have, to my knowledge, had the privilege of visiting Longlevens—although you are both welcome at any time—I want to talk a little more about the community there. Longlevens is a thriving neighbourhood with between 8,000 and 9,000 residents. On the same street as the post office is a wide range of shops, including the Co-op supermarket, a bakery, a pharmacy and a greengrocer. As the Post Office itself would agree, the post office is not an isolated, struggling service that cannot be justified economically or socially, but in many ways the hub of its local community.

Longlevens post office is especially valued by local pensioners. More than 22.8 per cent. of the population is aged over 60—that is higher than the average for Gloucester, which is in turn higher than the average nationally. Many of those pensioners are worried that they will no longer be able to rely on having such an important amenity at a close walking distance. Can we really expect them to walk several miles once or twice a week to what will, for some of them, be an unfamiliar part of town? The benefits that they derive from the post office do not relate solely to the transactions that are processed there. For many lonely senior citizens, a weekly or twice-weekly visit to the post office and other nearby shops is an important means of maintaining social contact with others.

That point was well made by my constituent, Jackie Dee, who runs the greengrocers two doors from the post office, and who visited Parliament with her family a fortnight ago on Wednesday. Jackie and her family feel a strong sense of duty towards their local community. They know their customers well and provide them with a valued service and friendship. It is their friends and customers who will lose out as a result of the closure of the local post office. To rub salt into their wounds, Sir Terry Leahy, Tesco's chief executive, told one of my constituents—presumably in a circular letter or round robin—that the post office counter would close to provide space for a much wider range of fruit, vegetables and healthy eating options. But residents can already get that at the greengrocers run by Jackie Dee just two doors away from the post office, as Tesco could easily have discovered with a little local research—what residents want is a post office.

What can be done about the situation? In recent weeks, I have engaged constructively with local people, Tesco, Post Office Ltd. and Postwatch, which has been very helpful. It would be foolish to make any decision on the future of the post office in Longlevens until POL has published its area plan. After all, that document will provide the context for taking strategic decisions about the future of post offices.

I therefore asked Tesco to defer a final decision until the area plan was made available. Until earlier this evening, the last trading date was set to be 8 May. I asked Tesco to postpone that and give the people of Longlevens the same extensive period of notice as it gave other post offices that it intended to close elsewhere. I welcome its response, which was made only hours before the debate. I also seek a specific guarantee that Tesco will not close the post office until an alternative location has been found and is ready for business. The guarantee, "while we search" in the letter should ideally read, "until we have found" a new location.

I understand that the Co-op has shown an interest in taking over the local branch from Tesco and would keep it in Longlevens. A local church and shops are also being pursued as possible relocation options. I should be grateful if the Minister encouraged Post Office Ltd. to take into account, when drawing up its area plan, the uncertainties surrounding the future of the post offices in north-east Gloucester. It should take all necessary steps to meet its obligation to ensure adequate provision for customers in Longlevens.

The people of Longlevens have made a strong case for keeping a post office in a central location in the neighbourhood. We know that such a post office is economically justifiable as well as socially desirable. Post Office Ltd. would agree with that. We know how hard local people are prepared to work to ensure that their voices are heard. We also know the Government's commitment to investing in strong communities. I therefore hope that if we all—the Government, the Post Office, Tesco and, most important, local people—work together, we can save the service and ensure that Longlevens remains a thriving community and a great place to live.

I confess to being a Tesco cardholder, like many people in Gloucester. I shop at the Tesco store on the cattle market site in my constituency at the weekends. I have held street stalls there; the staff are always friendly and accommodating. That also applies to the staff at the Quedgeley Tesco supermarket, where I have held many surgery sessions. They have been helpful in the past and I am sure that they will be again in future. That is why I believe that it is important that Tesco works with the local community and retains a good relationship.

[Mr. Parmjit Dhanda]

Headlines such as "Church attacks Tesco on Post Office closure" and "Boycott threats over closure plans" in The Citizen demonstrate the strength of local feeling on the issue. I intended to say, "By at the very least extending their date of notice until we can secure an alternative site for a post office in Longlevens, Tesco can help redeem itself", but it has already gone a long way towards doing that today. In many ways, it is a shame that it has taken until today for that to happen, but I welcome the decision none the less.

I hope that Tesco will now work with Post Office Ltd., Postwatch and local communities on the reinvention programme to stop the same thing from happening around the country. Earlier today, I was informed of similar incidents in Aylesbury and Swindon. As a result of Prime Minister's Questions and the Adjournment debate, I am conscious that Longlevens has the most famous post office in the country. However, all I want is to ensure that the community continues to have a post office. I am determined that we will succeed.

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate and, as we have heard, on the developments for which this debate has provided a catalyst. I am grateful to him for letting me know the concerns that he wanted to raise, which gave my officials an opportunity to make some urgent inquiries today.

My hon. Friend spelled out clearly the importance of good access to the local post office, and he highlighted the implications of Tesco's intention to remove the post office from its store at Longlevens. Of course, Tesco's decision is a commercial matter for the company. It does not stem directly from Government action, but I recognise the uncertainty that it has placed in the minds of my hon. Friend's constituents, and I want to respond to a number of the important points that he has made. We all share concerns about the future provision of post office services in our constituencies. The Government are fully committed to maintaining a viable nationwide network of post office branches.

The Post Office is undertaking a restructuring programme of its network in urban areas. I have responded in a number of debates in this Chamber and in Westminster Hall to hon. Members who are anxious to make sure that the rationalisation of post offices in their areas does not disadvantage their constituents. Recently, I have heard from a number of hon. Members who are concerned, like my hon. Friend, about Tesco's intentions for post offices within its stores. Tonight's debate will help to clarify what is going on and, I hope, help to alleviate some of the current uncertainty.

The Longlevens post office has not been proposed for closure under the Post Office Ltd. urban post office reinvention programme. It is necessary to draw the distinction that a removal from a Tesco store does not equate to a permanent closure of a post office if the service can continue, as my hon. Friend has argued, from somewhere else nearby.

My hon. Friend rightly made the point that Tesco acquired the T and S group chain of stores at the end of 2002. Tesco took over the post office contracts for the individual sites and is reviewing how many of those post offices will be retained. The group includes stores trading under the One Stop and Dillons names, containing 318 post offices, as he said. I welcome Tesco's assurance that it will work closely with the Post Office when reviewing its stores with post offices.

Mr. Dhanda: Is there not a point to be made about tying in consultations with urban area plans as well as post office reinvention?

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend is quite right.

Discussions have been held between Post Office Ltd. and Tesco. Tesco undertakes site-by-site review, and in a minority of locations where it chooses to establish a Tesco Express format, and where the site is consequently not large enough to continue to operate a post office branch, the company may wish to end the post office contract. To date, Tesco has confirmed that it intends to remove post offices from 37 stores that are to be converted to the Tesco Express format. It has also confirmed that it will retain around 260 post offices that operate from former T and S stores, including more than 200 in existing One Stop and Dillons stores and another 50 or so in those that are converted to Tesco Express stores.

On that basis, I can confirm that the figure suggested by my hon. Friend—that about 100 post offices might go—is certainly too large. On the basis of the information that Tesco has given me, the number will be significantly less. It will not be more than 58, I think, and a decision has so far been made on only 37.

Mr. Dhanda: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Timms: I must continue in order to make sure that I put on the record points that will be of wide interest in the House.

Any decision by Tesco to terminate its contract and to remove a post office from one of its stores is, of course, a commercial matter for the company. But I know that the House would join me in urging Tesco to give careful consideration to the effect on its customers of such a decision.

The history of the post office network can be traced back as far as 1635, and it has always been reliant on private business people to operate outlets. The vast majority, about 97 per cent., of the more than 16,000 post offices around the country are run by private business people, either by individual sub-postmasters or by chains such as Tesco. Typically, 10 per cent. of the offices in the network change hands from a resigning agent to a new agent each year.

My hon. Friend pointed out that the last day of trading for the Longlevens post office was to be 8 May, but Tesco made it clear today that that planned date no longer applies. Like my hon. Friend, I welcome that announcement.

To facilitate the relocation of post office services in Longlevens, Tesco has agreed with the Post Office that the contract can be transferred directly to a new partner, the costs of relocation being met by Tesco. Those arrangements should provide the best possible chance of relocating the post office locally, in line with the hopes expressed by my hon. Friend. I welcome Tesco's more flexible approach, and pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the energetic and, as we have heard, effective way in which he has pursued his constituent's interests.

My hon. Friend mentioned that the local Co-op might be interested in taking on the service. These matters are of course commercially confidential, but I am certain that the company will ensure that my hon. Friend is notified of the resolution as soon as one has taken place.

Tesco had given three months' notice of its intention. That is the time required by sub-postmasters' contracts, and it applies equally to either side. Where Tesco wants to remove a post office branch from one of its stores, it has committed itself, where possible, to giving twice that period of notice—six months rather than three. I hope that it will keep to that commitment in future cases, because the additional time will give the Post Office a better opportunity to review the need for an office and find alternative partners to continue to offer post office services where the need remains. Tesco's commitment to delaying the removal of the Longlevens office from its store and to work to ensure a smooth transfer of the business should be applauded.

To its credit, Tesco has committed itself to helping the Post Office to maximise the prospects of a successful relocation of post offices that it can no longer accommodate in stores converted to the Tesco Express format where the Post Office needs to retain a post office in the area. It will work actively with the Post Office to find alternative individuals or businesses keen to operate the post office nearby.

I hope that it is clear from what I have said that the proposed closure of Longlevens post office is not connected with the urban reinvention programme, but I shall say a little about that programme in the context of this debate. My hon. Friend has already seen a number of post office branches in his constituency close, as he has said. The aim of the programme is to address over-provision in many urban areas and to establish a network of offices that fits the level of business now available.

Mr. Dhanda: Will my hon. Friend give way very briefly?

Mr. Timms: I do not think I can. There are a couple of points that I want to put on the record.

I understand that Tesco has been made aware of the general time scale in which the Post Office is scheduled to produce its urban reinvention programme area plans, and where possible it will try to co-ordinate with the Post Office. I gather that in the case of my hon. Friend's constituency, the Post Office expects to do that in July or August. If, as in this instance, Tesco has reviewed a particular location, wants to end its contract and has advised the Post Office before the drawing up of the urban reinvention programme area plan, the Post Office can take a view, within its overall urban reinvention planning, on whether a post office branch is needed in that location. I think that that reflects my hon. Friend's hope that the two exercises can be brought together.

Although the review of Gloucester is not due for some months, the Post Office has said that it aims to ensure continued service for the customers of Longlevens. As my hon. Friend said, the branch there was itself suggested as an alternative for customers of the Oxstalls branch, and the company is seeking an alternative partner in the vicinity. In other areas where Tesco decides to remove a post office from one of its stores and there is a need for the service to continue, the Post Office will work to replace the branch nearby. It has given an assurance that in such cases it will not view a decision by Tesco to remove a post office as any kind of blanket opportunity to close branches, over and above those being handled via the proper urban reinvention process.

My hon. Friend talked of the possible threat to Barnwood post office. The Post Office is aware of the planning application for redevelopment of the Barnwood post office site, but I understand that no notice of termination of the contract or resignation of the sub-postmaster has been submitted. It will consider—

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Patients Choice

1. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the involvement of private sector providers in his proposals for patients choice. [162775]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): The national health service is expanding as never before and in addition, as we promised in our manifesto, independent sector providers are supplementing this expansion and helping to deliver increased capacity and choice.

Lynne Jones: Do the Government have any plans to make it mandatory for treatment with a private sector provider to be included in the choices to be offered to patients? If so, why?

Dr. Reid: The whole point of choice is that patients can choose from a range of options rather than being dictated to in what choice they make. We made it absolutely plain in our last manifesto that, in addition to expanding the national health service at an unprecedented rate, we would also supplement the investment and increase capacity and reform by purchasing operations from the private—the independent—sector. That has had the salutary effect of providing a degree of choice and additional capacity in the national health service. Our approach is always to be at the behest of patients rather than dictating to them where they should place their choice.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that my constituent, Mr. Evershed of Swanley, was told by the NHS last week that he would have to wait 72 weeks for a scan? If that is the best that the NHS can do after all these extra billions, surely the sooner the right hon. Gentleman gets some private sector help organised, the better.

Dr. Reid: I obviously do not know about the case of that constituent, and it is no good the hon. Gentleman waving a piece of paper at me—that does not enlighten me much more. If what he says is happening, the wait is far too long; I agree with him entirely on that. That is why I hope he will agree that more investment should be put into the national health service. He may be interested to know that we are bringing in something like 400,000 more operations, and that 1 million more patients are being treated.

The maximum waiting time under the patients charter under the Government of whom the hon. Gentleman was a Minister was envisaged as being two years. When we came to Government, the maximum waiting time for an operation was 18 months. Now no one is waiting 18 months, 15 months or 12 months, and I hope that by the end of this month no one will be waiting nine months. In other words, we will have halved the maximum waiting time that was extended to patients by his Government.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): I was talking to an NHS consultant a little while ago and he did not appear to need free NHS croutons. He told me that he was embarrassed by the amount of money my Government were paying him to treat in the private sector his NHS patients. "Embarrassed" was the word he used. When my right hon. Friend came to the Health Committee, he will recall that the Committee estimated that using the private sector through the concordat was costing the NHS on average 40 per cent. more per item of treatment. It subsequently came out that the figure was 43 per cent. How can my right hon. Friend justify the amount of money that we are paying some consultants? Bearing in mind his comments about additional capacity, if these consultants were not working in the private sector they could actually be doing more hours treating NHS patients in the NHS.

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right—I do not justify the amount of money that we used to pay for operations in the independent sector. That is why we have stopped purchasing them in small amounts at spot prices. For instance, the recent purchase of 40,000 additional cataract operations from the independent sector will result in a huge reduction in waiting time and faster access. They will supplement the NHS. The price at which I am purchasing them is not 40 per cent. above the NHS tariff; it is 10 per cent. below. I envisage that the 250,000-plus operations that we will buy to supplement an expanding NHS will still be only 5 per cent.—perhaps a maximum of 10 or 15 per cent.—of NHS operations. Those operations will not be purchased at anything like 140 per cent. of the NHS tariff. Indeed, when the contracts are renewed, they will be at the NHS tariff or they will not be renewed.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): In considering the private sector providers in the right hon. Gentleman's proposals for patients choice, will he bear in mind that most of the 60,000 practitioners of complementary medicine are still in the private sector? Does he agree that the report that his Department has just published—and which is signed by the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton)—"Regulation of herbal medicine and acupuncture: Proposals for statutory regulation", is a significant step forward and shows that the Government have finally accepted the importance of all forms of complementary medicine? Very soon, we will have a truly integrated health service that brings in all these practitioners. That will cut bills and make life a lot easier for the Secretary of State.

Dr. Reid: We need two things. We need the regulation of that sector because then we can extend patients choice on using elements of it. It is a huge step forward, together with the other steps that we are making in the national health service, and we go forward together.

I noticed that yesterday, for the first time in seven years, the Opposition acknowledged the progress that is being made. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), my opposite number, for saying yesterday that progress has been made to improve both the nation's health and the NHS itself. If the Conservative party publicly recognises that, there must be significant improvements.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we should not be ideological about using choice in the private sector? We should be neither ideologically against it nor for it, because the question is whether it improves the quality of services and equality of access to those services. In that respect, will he tell us whether patients who are offered the choice are exercising it? Will he especially examine transport and consider whether that is undermining some people's ability to exercise choice in the NHS?

Dr. Reid: I very much agree with my hon. Friend that the matter of principle is not who the provider is, but equal access to health care that is free at the point of delivery. That is what distinguishes this side of the House from the other. Conservative Members seem to operate on the principle that people can have choice provided they have enough money in their pockets to pay for half the operation. That is a scandal that would undermine the founding principle of the national health service.

The Department of Health is reviewing patient transport arrangements in the light of the social exclusion unit report "Making the connections". The review will ensure that the implications of choice are taken on board. The Department's guidance on choice at six months provides for patients to be offered transport free of charge, if required, to enable them to take up their choice of hospital. Once again, that represents equal access to improving health care that is free at the point of need and delivery. That is the founding principle of the NHS, and as long as I am Secretary of State and the Government are in power, it will be preserved.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): Will the Secretary of State confirm that such progress as has been made to reduce waiting lists and waiting times has been achieved largely through the greater use of the private sector? Now that the Government have belatedly recognised that meeting the needs of patients can be best achieved through promoting a mixed economy in health care, does he think that he might find it easier to persuade his Back Benchers of the merits of the proposal if it were the patient who decided whether to go into the independent sector, rather than a Minister or a public sector bureaucrat?

Dr. Reid: No, I cannot confirm that the progress is largely a result of the supplementary operations that we are purchasing. They are making a significant contribution, but I would not diminish in any way the reforms that have been introduced by the national health service itself and directly employed staff. The hon. Gentleman should remember that more than half of the new treatment centres that are dealing more efficiently with operations and increasing the output of health care have directly employed NHS staff. We must consider primary care, the activity that is now being done by general practitioners, out-patients, the fact that NHS Direct responds to some 6.3 million people, the new walk-in centres and the fact that nurses can now act as nurse consultants and nurse practitioners, because all those measures have been integral to the increased productivity of the NHS.

The hon. Gentleman made a big concession from the Opposition Front Bench last night by admitting for the first time in seven years that there have been significant improvements in the NHS, so I ask him please not to start to step back by saying that they are all attributable to the private sector.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the extra money that has gone into the NHS? The Clatterbridge centre for oncology has managed to cut waiting lists for radiotherapy treatment from 39 days to a mere 16 days because of investment that has created five new consultants, a 20 per cent. increase in staff, nine new Linex scanners and new technology that means that every hour for which the scanners are available in a day can be properly booked and used. That has led to a massive decrease in waiting lists and an increase in the quality of service for those who have cancer and need it to be treated in the Merseyside and Wirral area.

Dr. Reid: Indeed, attention to treatment for and the number of deaths from cancer when we came to power were, frankly, a scandal in comparison with the position in other nations. We are now spending about £570 million more a year on cancer alone and we have 30 per cent. more consultants. Professor Mike Richards, the national cancer director, announced a fortnight ago that 99 per cent. of people suspected of suffering from cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks. That is light years away from the position under the previous Government. All that I can say is that the figures speak for themselves. In the 33 years since 1971 there has been a reduction in premature deaths from cancer of 22 per cent., almost half of which was achieved in the first five years of this Government's period in office, when there was a 10.3 per cent. reduction in cancer. If that is not a significant improvement in the national health service and the health of our nation, I do not know what is.

Cystic Fibrosis

2. The Reverend Martin Smyth (Belfast South) (UUP): What assessment he has made of the treatment required for cystic fibrosis. [162776]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): Current treatment comprises physiotherapy and medication to counter infections, assist nutrition and improve lung function.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that in cystic fibrosis week we should remember the society that worked for 40 years to develop understanding of the condition? The defective gene was discovered in 1989, but the society still needs help to care for 7,500 people on the register, with more being added daily. Does he acknowledge its attempt, over the next five years, to reach a target of £15 million to improve therapy, and what are the Government doing to assist?

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is quite right—this is a pernicious disease that is incurable at the moment. We need to go much further to develop new therapies for the disease, and gene therapies obviously give us the best hope of doing so. We recognise that through the genetics White Paper, with £2.5 million specifically intended for cystic fibrosis research. In addition, there is a further £4 million to improve researchers' access to the vectors necessary for research, £1 million to investigate the long-term safety of gene therapies, and £3 million for single gene disorder research, including research on cystic fibrosis. We therefore acknowledge the importance of that research, and are putting the money in to make sure that it happens.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): My hon. Friend is right about the importance of research into single gene disorders such as cystic fibrosis and, indeed, Duchenne muscular dystrophy, on which there was recently an Adjournment debate to which he replied. Can he tell the House when he expects an announcement to be made on how the money in the genetics White Paper for single gene disorder therapy research is likely to be distributed?

Dr. Ladyman: I cannot give my hon. Friend a specific date, but an announcement will be made as expeditiously as possible in the not-too-far-distant future. He mentioned Duchenne muscular dystrophy, so he will be interested to know that as a result of the money that we are putting in and the Government's investment in gene research, more than half of the gene therapy research projects in Europe are now being carried out in this country.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Ind Con): I agree with the Minister and welcome the fact that treatment for cystic fibrosis over the past two to three decades has improved dramatically, ensuring longer life and a better quality of life for people afflicted with the disease. We also trust that research on genetic material from adult stem cells will result in better treatments in future. However, does he accept that early diagnosis is important to cystic fibrosis and other conditions?

Dr. Ladyman: I absolutely accept that early diagnosis is necessary, and we are working to make sure that there is universal screening of the new born to see if they have cystic fibrosis. That provision will be implemented in the next year or two, and we are also making checks widely available during pregnancy to screen for the abnormality. We entirely accept the hon. Lady's points and are rolling out screening as rapidly as possible.

Health Care (Droitwich Spa)

3. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on health care provision in Droitwich Spa. [162777]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): South Worcestershire primary care trust is responsible for commissioning health care in Droitwich Spa to meet national and local priorities for improving health, tackling health inequalities and modernising services. Over the current three-year period, South Worcestershire's allocation will increase in cash terms by £60.6 million or more than 30 per cent. That is a significant level of investment and will deliver real benefits and results for the people of Droitwich Spa.

Mr. Luff: Is the Minister aware that Droitwich Spa is in danger of becoming the Cinderella of the health service in Worcestershire and, probably, the whole of the west midlands? It has no community beds, its hospital has closed, its bus service to Worcestershire Royal hospital is being cut and now, thanks to retrospective funding rules imposed by the Department upon the primary care trust, an innovative programme for a new one-stop shop, the lynch-pin of which was a new health centre, looks to have been abandoned. May I urge the Minister to look again at the application of those funding rules, not just for Droitwich but for seven other important projects in Worcestershire, and to ensure that Droitwich can get the full invitation to the national health service spending ball about which his colleagues speak so frequently?

Dr. Ladyman: I find it pretty incredible that the hon. Gentleman should claim massive cuts on such a scale when a huge extra investment is being made in his area. I entirely accept that decisions are now being made locally about where expenditure is to be made, but the scheme he mentioned in Droitwich Spa has not been abandoned. It is simply one of the eight schemes that will be prioritised locally. The Government have decided that decisions should be made where decisions are best made: by local people in the local area. We will allocate money for those schemes and local people will make the decisions about which ones go ahead.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): The decision by South Worcestershire primary care trust temporarily to suspend the work on eight GP premises affects plans for the Newtown road development in my constituency. I understand that the primary care trust is awaiting an allocation of funding from the Department. I stress how important the development is to my constituents. Can my hon. Friend give a speedy response on the allocation, so that locally we can once again start debating how extra NHS resources are spent, instead of talking about cuts?

Dr. Ladyman: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance he seeks. The decision on the allocation of funds is imminent. It will be made very shortly. Once the money has been allocated, the decisions will be made locally, and I am sure my hon. Friend will make representations to the committee that will make those decisions. I stress again that decisions used to be taken at the centre by Ministers in Whitehall. We decided that the most appropriate place for those decisions to be taken was in localities, so we gave the money to the localities to make those decisions. There has been no abandonment or hold-up.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): The Minister has not answered the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) about why the Government or the Minister have changed the private finance initiative rules in such a way as seriously to affect capital projects throughout Worcestershire.

Dr. Ladyman: This has nothing to do with PFI schemes; it has to do with the funding of GP premises. I accept that the closure date for projects to be funded from the centre was made retrospectively. That was to stop what would have happened otherwise—a large number of poorly quality-controlled projects being pushed through early to get them under the wire. We took the half-year point as a cut-off point between when decisions would be made at the centre and when they would be made locally. Now the schemes to which the hon. Gentleman refers, including five in his constituency, will be prioritised locally. I very much hope that all five will go ahead, but it will be a matter for local decision-making, which is as it should be.

Senior NHS Management

4. Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): What plans he has to develop senior management within the NHS. [162778]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Although NHS managers represent less than 3 per cent. of the work force, they play a vital role in supporting clinical staff to provide the very best care to patients. They are being offered high quality development programmes to maintain and develop their skills and to help them to carry out their key leadership role to the highest standards.

Mr. Norman: As the Secretary of State knows, I welcome the steps that have been taken—the leadership programme and so on—to develop managers in the NHS, but is he fully aware of the urgency of the situation? Only last month the Commission for Health Improvement called for a new generation of managers in the health service. The average tenure of a chief executive in the health service is reported to be only 700 days, but if the Secretary of State has different figures, perhaps he will let us know. This morning his office reconfirmed to me that it has no idea of the background of existing chief executives or where they came from. Will he tell the House what steps are being taken to assess the existing management pool, and to bring in new management talent and fast-track clinicians into management? Without that happening, would not the Government's policy be all about money and not enough about people?

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman brings a great deal of experience—and, if I may say so without irrevocably damaging his career, a great deal of sense—to most of his contributions. However, I do not think that he was quite accurate on a couple of points there. First, we have a good idea of where the people at executive board level come from—[Interruption.] Well, I can tell him now that 30 per cent. of them come from a clinical background, about 20 per cent. from a managerial background, 18 per cent. from a nursing background and only 14 per cent. from a financial background. That seems to give the lie to the hon. Gentleman's second point.

However, I think that the hon. Gentleman and I agree that, in the midst of what is, by any standards, a huge, almost revolutionary, transformation of the national health service, there is a huge premium on personal quality and on the development of managerial skills. We are trying to achieve that both inside the NHS, through the leadership programmes, and also—I say this unashamedly—by learning from outside.

Throughout the national health service, we are trying to learn best practice from outside management and to recruit externally. The Modernisation Agency is applying, among other things, the theories of lean manufacturing to NHS management. That theory was most famously demonstrated by the transformation of the Toyota group. We are talking about a huge revolutionary transformation and revitalisation of the national health service, and the hon. Gentleman is right to say that it will depend a great deal on the skills of management locally and not just on the skills of Ministers at the centre.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that another excellent way to encourage existing NHS staff to think about a management role is through the leadership schemes in which the Royal College of Nursing is involved? I was delighted last week to welcome a group of nurses from the Surrey and Sussex Healthcare NHS trust, who were extremely well supported by their existing management and by an executive board member to whom they have direct access. They came to Parliament understanding the processes involved, and they are really developing their skills so as to be able to take on the role of managers in the future.

Dr. Reid: Absolutely. This is not just a matter of the providers being extra-skilled or developing their own responsibilities and skills; it is also about the benefit to patients. This morning, I was given a report by Sir George Alberti, a national director for access to emergency services, about this winter. We have done very well this winter, although I am not in the least complacent; we could always have some unforeseen circumstances in the future. However, there has been a marvellous increase in the quality of treatment and care, and a decrease in the crisis level, because of the superb contribution of NHS staff, not least the nurses, including nurse practitioners, nurse consultants and nurse specialists who are now doing jobs hitherto denied to them and making a marvellous contribution to the health of the nation. I congratulate them, as I do my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) belatedly on her 50th birthday yesterday.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am sure that the Secretary of State will agree that leadership and good management in the NHS are essential to achieving the NHS's objectives. Does he also agree, however, that this is not about the quantity of management so much as the quality? Why, then, did he last week seem to applaud the fact that the number of managers in the NHS was rising at twice the rate of the number of nurses? Indeed, over the past decade, the number of managers has risen at three times the rate of the number of nurses. Is it not the case that the number of managers is increasing at that much higher rate simply to deal with the bureaucratic impositions of the Government, including the 206 external controls that the Treasury admitted last week were being imposed on NHS managers? If the Secretary of State can get rid of those, good managers can be given the opportunity to manage.

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman starts off by saying it is not about quantity, it is about quality. Then he proceeds to peddle myths about quantity. Let me destroy the myths. First, senior management in the national health service, at 32,000 personnel out of 1.3 million, is less than 3 per cent. of total management. That is leaner and fitter than the private health sector. Secondly, since 1997, 224,000 more staff have been in the NHS, 13,000 of whom—5 per cent.—have been managers. Thirdly, in the past 12 months, 59,000 more staff have been in the NHS, of whom 3,000—no more than 5 per cent.—were managers. Will he stop peddling this myth, particularly when 87 of the 165 Conservative MPs are on the Front Bench, so 53 per cent. of them are senior management? They therefore have no right to talk.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to a specific management issue in the NHS? Research by Breakthrough Breast Cancer has shown recently that 98 per cent. of patients referred urgently by their GPs to a breast cancer specialist see one within two weeks, on which I congratulate him. Is he aware, however, that many women are referred as routine cases, which can take much longer—sometimes up to 17 weeks? The specific issue that I want to bring to his attention is that 42 per cent. of GPs do not receive any feedback about the accuracy of their referrals. I hope that he will look into this matter and investigate it.

Dr. Reid: I am not sure that I agree entirely with the figures that my hon. Friend uses, but I agree with the general thrust of her comments. Now that the Opposition have accepted that significant improvements are happening in the NHS, I hope that we will reach a balanced appraisal of just how far we still have to go. It is the case that 99 per cent. of women whom doctors suspect of having cancer are seen by specialists within a fortnight. Nevertheless, it is estimated that about 30 per cent. are not picked up as suspected cancer cases in the first instance. That troubles me, and it is a matter to which we are giving our attention.

NHS Services (Rural Areas)

5. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What plans he has to improve access to NHS services for those in rural areas. [162779]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): The Government are committed to ensuring that everyone has fast and convenient access to NHS services, wherever they live, at all times, and on an equitable basis.

Mr. Heath: Does the hon. Lady understand that many people in rural areas, particularly in the west country, feel that they are uniquely disadvantaged in terms of access to NHS services, whether in primary care, including dentistry and chiropody; acute services, with large distances between accident and emergency units; domiciliary care; and even services that are intrinsic to the community such as maternity services, with small baby units often under threat? Within the generality of improvements to the NHS, which I recognise and applaud, can the Minister now look at specific service delivery for rural areas so that people in rural areas have access to NHS services on an equitable basis with cities?

Miss Johnson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his acknowledgement of the progress that we are making. We also have 78 new rural one-stop primary care centres in place, providing easy access to health services, and we will have 100 rural one-stop centres by December this year. He mentioned that there is a question about dental access in his area, as he regards it. There are only 2,524 people per dentist in the Somerset and Dorset strategic health authority area, which is relatively well served—it is below the national average of 2,660 people per dentist. A good local service is therefore being provided in his area, which is reflected, for example, in the reduction in numbers of patients waiting for an in-patient appointment within the East Somerset NHS trust, with only 83 people waiting more than six months.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): Should not health need be the key determinant of where resources go? In the rural communities I represent—former coalfield communities—rates of cancer, cardiovascular and respiratory problems and many other illnesses are startlingly high. When the time comes, will my hon. Friend pay particular attention to the formula whereby basic sums are allocated across the nation, and ensure that enough goes to coalfield areas such as Wakefield where there are a lot of health problems?

Miss Johnson: We are well aware of the health inequalities that persist, and are determined to tackle them. The formula for the distribution of funds to primary care trusts already reflects the existence of deprivation and health inequalities, but we will look at it again over the next few months. I can reassure my hon. Friend that the issue is very much on our agenda.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Given the importance of local hospitals to people in rural areas, will the Minister tell us what progress has been made in the attempts to postpone implementation of the European working time directive?

Miss Johnson: We have had many discussions with colleagues about that important subject, which the hon. Gentleman is right to raise. Those discussions are continuing, and much effort has been devoted to finding a way of maintaining the services that we wish to maintain.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a shortage of NHS dentists in many rural areas? Is she aware that officials in her Department reporting to the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), are working on proposals to increase the number of dentists in training? Would the Department welcome an application from Hull York medical school to open a school of dentistry? Its brand of training focuses on training in the community, especially in rural areas. That might prove helpful.

Miss Johnson: I know of my hon. Friend's long-standing interest in dentistry. I am pleased to be able to tell him that we are currently considering where future opportunities might arise. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is listening carefully, assures me that she will bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said when investigating the possibilities offered by the York area.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I am sure the Minister agrees that community hospitals are particularly important in providing access to health care in rural areas. She did not seem to have much of a clue about the implications of the European working time directive for such hospitals, but will she reflect on the impact of the new general practitioner contract? GPs are currently declining clinical assistantships in community hospitals, which is endangering the future viability of a vital health service resource in many areas including my constituency.

Miss Johnson: Of course community facilities are important. Primary care trusts have recognised that. Having carried out surveys to establish what their local communities want, many PCTs are now providing many more services of the type provided by community hospitals, such as orthopaedic services and mental health services on an outreach basis. That is because we have devolved funding to local areas, which enables PCTs to buy health care that reflects the needs of their own populations.

Eye Treatments

6. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet representatives of patients' organisations to discuss eye treatment procedures. [162780]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): My fellow Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Rosie Winterton), met representatives of the Royal National Institute of the Blind and the Macular Disease Society in December to discuss photodynamic therapy. Ministers will continue to meet patient organisations regularly.

Mr. Bellingham: The Minister will know that a quarter of a million people in the United Kingdom suffer from age-related macular degeneration and are going blind. That includes many people in my constituency. The good news is that treatment is now possible through photodynamic therapy, but the bad news is that the Government deny the treatment on the ground of a shortage of trained professionals. Why does the RNIB say that the Government are wrong in their assumption? Why do most national health service centres continue to treat patients who are prepared to pay for private treatment?

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on almost every count. It was not possible to implement the National Institute for Clinical Excellence guidelines within the normal three months' deadline precisely because we needed more staff and training. Indeed, the national institute recognised that when it recommended that we should take longer to implement the new service. We made it clear to the NHS that if the capacity is there, it should use it. That is precisely what is happening.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that 95 per cent. of primary care trusts are funding photodynamic therapy in line with the NICE recommendations, including for some of his constituents.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): I recently visited the Christopher eye hospital in Wigan, where patients who once waited months, if not years, for cataract operations under a previous Administration now wait just weeks. I am pleased that the hospital has been accepted as a regional centre for photodynamic therapy. It could begin to provide that treatment tomorrow, if necessary, but patients from Wigan continue to travel to Liverpool to receive it. Will the Minister look into whether negotiations could be held between our local primary care trusts so that the service is up and running in the next couple of weeks?

Mr. Hutton: I am happy to look into that. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for highlighting a significant achievement of the NHS in the past few years, which the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) was gracious enough to acknowledge yesterday. There have been 113,000 more cataract operations performed this year than in 1996–97 and we are confident that we shall get maximum waiting times for those operations down to three months by the end of the year. That is a significant step forward for the NHS.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Further to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), the Minister will know about various independent claims, such as that of the RNIB, that, on average, more than 100 people go blind each week because of the Government's decision to extend the NICE guidance deadline on AMD because they believed that there was insufficient capacity to provide treatment. Yet up to 50 NHS centres throughout the country are equipped to treat patients, as the Prime Minister recently acknowledged in a letter to the Leader of the Opposition, and some primary care trusts, such as South-West Oxfordshire, clearly stated that the problem was not capacity but shortage of money. That is why so few extra patients have been treated since the NICE guidance was issued. Given that NICE confirmed at the press conference on 24 September that implementation would take place in three months, will the Government stop hiding behind NICE, realise that the cost of blindness far exceeds that of treatment and tell the PCTs to bring the deadline forward?

Mr. Hutton: Let us get one thing clear: we want to implement the guidelines as quickly as possible for the obvious reasons that the hon. Gentleman has stated. The advice that I have received is that AMD never results in complete sight loss, and I am therefore not sure on what basis the hon. Gentleman claims that people will go completely blind. I stress to Conservative Members, who raise the matter repeatedly, that we are making additional resources available to fund NICE guidelines.

I ask the hon. Gentleman and all Conservative Members who have made strong arguments about the subject to reflect on the fact that, in the 18 years that they had stewardship of the NHS, not a single initiative dealt with postcode prescribing and the subsequent unfairness in terms of access to medication. We have established mechanisms to tackle that, and we have invested resources. It is also worth remembering that when we had the opportunity to vote on establishing NICE, the hon. Gentleman and all Conservative Members voted against it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House for co-operation. We have reached Question 6 and are about to go on to Question 7. We need shorter questions and shorter answers. I need hon. Members' co-operation.

Domiciliary Care

7. Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): If he will make a statement on the availability of domiciliary care. [162782]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): Domiciliary care provision was 14 per cent. higher in 2002 compared with 1997.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful for that short response from the Minister, but he omitted to mention the simple fact that there has been a 20 per cent. fall in the number of households receiving domiciliary care since 1997. Given that, can he explain why the Government intend to waste £100 million on fines for delayed hospital discharges when most experts agree that that money would be far better spent on more home help and more care for the elderly?

Dr. Ladyman: First, let us consider the hon. Gentleman's notion that the number of people receiving care has gone down. If we look at the full range of services, including respite care and meals, the number of people receiving care has gone up from 925,000 to 988,000. He might have liked to announce the fact that his own social services department has had a 67 per cent. increase in its adult social services budget and that the Government's actions to combat delayed discharges are saving 1.25 million bed days a year.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that, although we still have a long way to go, we have made great progress towards achieving better co-ordination between social services and the NHS in Lancashire and almost everywhere else in the country since the Government were elected, and that we shall continue to work towards that?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As he is aware, we have increased the number of people who are receiving intensive home care and able to stay in their own home by 30 per cent.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): On 19 January, I received an answer to a parliamentary question informing me that 62 of the 243 fully registered domiciliary care providers did not meet the standards. Twenty years after 1984, it appears that we have our own Ministry of Truth, because imagine my surprise when I saw in Hansard that the number 62 had been altered to two. The Minister is keen to see more vulnerable older people accessing domiciliary care services. Is that why the figure seems to have changed? The real scandal is the fact that a quarter of domiciliary care agencies are below standard. Is he satisfied that there is no end-date by which all agencies must achieve satisfactory standards?

Dr. Ladyman: I obviously have no way of knowing what is in Hansard without checking it myself, and I will certainly look at the figures that the hon. Lay has mentioned. All domiciliary care agencies meet the regulations, that is, the legal requirement, but many of them are not yet up to the national minimum standards that we have set. That is wrong—indeed, that is why we set those standards—and that is why we are driving up standards. What a pity that she and her hon. Friends keep opposing us as we do that.

NHS Dentists (West Cumbria)

8. Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): What plans he has to increase the number of NHS dentists in west Cumbria. [162784]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Primary care trusts in my hon. Friend's area plan to increase the number of NHS dentists by expanding the dental access centre in Egremont, using new access funds to double the number of practices offering additional day-time emergency sessions, and recruiting more dentists from the UK and overseas.

Tony Cunningham: I thank the Minister for that reply. For quite a considerable time, we have been waiting for a pilot scheme in west Cumbria to increase the number of NHS dentists. Will she take a personal interest in that initiative, as that could go some way to resolving many of the problems associated with lack of access to NHS dentists?

Ms Winterton: I know that my hon. Friend has taken a close interest in the pilot project on behalf of his constituents. It will mean that the PCT will directly employ the dentists and staff to increase NHS dentistry in the area. There were some problems in agreeing the final arrangements for that pilot, but I am delighted to be able to tell him that it will be up and running by 1 May.

Paddington Health Campus

9. Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress on the Paddington health campus development. [162785]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The proposals for the Paddington health campus scheme are being reviewed by my Department in conjunction with local health bodies. We expect to make an announcement about the future of the scheme before the end of this month.

Ms Buck: My right hon. Friend will know that I believe that it is absolutely right to review the business case and to ensure that we get value for money from the scheme, but yesterday afternoon I and other hon. Members met senior clinicians from Royal Brompton and Harefield hospitals, Imperial college medical school and St. Mary's hospital, who made it clear that to do nothing is not an option. When my right hon. Friend considers the review of the business case, will he bear in mind the costs of reprovisioning for Royal Brompton and Harefield hospitals, Imperial college medical school and St. Mary's hospital, should there be any further delay in the Paddington campus site?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her support of our work on the scheme, and I strongly agree that what she described as the do-nothing option is not a serious possibility for us. We recognise the need for improvement and investment, not just in the St. Mary's site but in specialist heart services across west London. I am confident that she will support us in ensuring that we get the investment in the right place at the right time.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): The word "progress" is a bit of a contradiction in terms in respect of the Paddington health campus, for seldom has so little been done by so many at such great cost to the public purse. Could the Minister give us some idea of when the outline planning application, which has been necessary since February 2003, will be lodged with Westminster city council?

Mr. Hutton: As I said, all those issues are being looked at as part of the current review. It is fair to point out that the hon. Gentleman is not a supporter of the Paddington health campus and does not want to see it progress. The rest of us, on the Labour Benches, need to judge his comments in that context.

Psychiatry Services

10. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): What plans he has to improve psychiatry services. [162787]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Mental health services for all age groups are being modernised in line with the standards set out in the national service frameworks and the commitments and additional funds announced in the NHS plan.

Mr. Challen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer, which shows that the Government are committed to improving psychiatric services. My particular concern today is for the 750,000 people who are suffering from dementia—a figure that is bound to increase as people live longer. There must be an almost equal number of people caring for those suffering from dementia, and I imagine that many of those people will suffer from depression occasionally. All that will put a great demand on mental health services. Is my hon. Friend confident that we will match the expectations of older people in our delivery of mental health services to them?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is quite right to say that dementia is one of the most important health and social care issues of our time. In the past there have been unacceptable variations in the quality of care delivered to those suffering from dementia and those caring for them. That is why a key element of the national service framework for older people is an examination of how we can improve the early diagnosis of dementia and so provide better treatment and better access to care plans. At the same time, I am sure that my hon. Friend will join me in welcoming the statement that the Secretary of State made yesterday, in which he announced extra funding for medical research into conditions such as dementia and Alzheimer's.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): It is a sad fact that many people languishing today in Her Majesty's prisons have been sent there by the courts because there are inadequate beds or places in psychiatric hospitals. That was discovered many years ago by the Select Committee on Social Services when it undertook an inquiry into the prison medical service. Will the Minister tell us what improvements are taking place in the provision of psychiatry and psychiatric services to those who commit crimes and are sent to prison, but who should in fact be in psychiatric hospitals?

Ms Winterton: Extra investment for psychiatric care has gone into prison in-patient services. At the same time, we are addressing how we can provide treatment earlier to people in that community through a series of measures, such as assertive outreach and crisis resolution teams, so that we can ensure that people do not get to the stage that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. He will know that we also considered various measures in the draft mental health Bill, and we will make further announcements on that shortly.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend will be aware that when choice and improvement in mental health services are discussed, one of the highest priorities for patients is their ability to choose the lead health professional who will be concerned with their case. That can involve choosing from among psychiatrists, or choosing a psychologist or a trained psychiatric nurse instead of a psychiatrist. Does my hon. Friend feel that access to such choice could be accommodated in the improvements that are certainly taking place today in mental health services?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the choice agenda for mental health is vital if we are to improve services for those with mental health problems. The new home resolution teams and home treatment teams are examples of the need to look at new ways of working for professionals. We also need to ensure that the most appropriate person is available to the service user—a person to whom they can relate when discussing their care plans.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Does the Minister agree with the vast majority of psychiatrists who claimed in a recent survey that it now takes more than six months, following an initial presentation at a general practitioner's surgery, to be referred to a psychiatrist, and that the situation has got worse because of the recruitment crisis among psychiatric staff? Worryingly, a number of such staff are themselves on long-term sick leave for stress-related conditions. Most worryingly, the survey showed that some 40 per cent. of black and ethnic minority mental health service users who asked for help in the past three years were turned away, compared with a figure of 28 per cent. for the white population. Moreover, 28 black people per 100,000 of population end up in secure units, compared with just four per 100,000 of the white population. How many full-time psychiatrists are working in the NHS compared with seven years ago, and what specifically is the Minister doing to address the appalling two-tier system, which militates against the prospects for ethnic minority patients?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There were several questions from the hon. Gentleman but there should be only one supplementary. The Minister will answer one of the supplementary questions.

Ms Winterton: Since 1997, the number of psychiatric consultants has increased by almost a third—from 2,447 in 1997 to 3,217 in 2003.

Oncology Care

11. Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): What measures he is taking to ensure that the NHS delivers high quality oncology care; and if he will make a statement. [162788]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): We are spending £570million extra a year on fighting cancer and we are tackling it on all fronts: through prevention, screening, treatment, care and research. As a result, death rates from cancer in the under-75s have fallen by more than 10 per cent. since 1996.

Mr. MacDougall: I welcome the 7.3 per cent. increase in health service spending for the period to 2007–08, and the tremendous success of the cancer strategy to which my hon. Friend refers; indeed, where once we had the third highest death rate in Europe, we now have the fifth lowest. But does she agree that in the light of the challenges presented by more people living for longer and the requirement for greater health care, there is no room for complacency in Government circles?

Miss Johnson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support for the progress that we have made. It is interesting to note that the cancer mortality rate for all ages—including the older age range—has dropped by 12.5 per cent. since 1971, and that more than half of that decrease has occurred in recent years. Of course, we need to emphasise the importance of long-term medical conditions in the light of people's increasing longevity, and we are making progress in ensuring that people do not die prematurely from diseases such as cancer and coronary heart disease.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): Can the Minister confirm that the majority of the 10 per cent. reduction in the cancer mortality rate has occurred because of the reduction in the number of men who take up smoking? In fact, that has had a 30-year impact. What steps do the Government intend to take further to reduce smoking among both men and women?

Miss Johnson: We have made progress in encouraging both men and women to give up smoking. Recent figures, including those for young people, are encouraging, and as a result there are much-improved survival rates for lung cancer and breast cancer, as the hon. Lady knows. We have made significant improvements in those two important areas, but we need to take further action in many others. We are ensuring that investment reaches those patients who need it, and such investment has included the provision of 1,000 more cancer consultants since 1997, and 1,000 pieces of new equipment for the diagnosis and treatment of cancer.

Smoking cessation services are being actively promoted, and we are looking into taking further steps to encourage and extend the range of smoking cessation work. It is an extremely high priority to persuade more people who want to quit smoking—seven out of 10 smokers want to do so—to give it up and improve their long-term health.

Obesity

12. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What estimate he has made of the cost to the NHS of dealing with illness related to obesity. [162789]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): The National Audit Office report "Tackling Obesity in England" estimated that the cost to the NHS of treating the consequences of obesity in 1998 was approximately £469.9 million per year. The cost to the wider economy was estimated to be more than £2 billion, so everyone has responsibility for action to tackle obesity.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. Is she concerned about the massive and measurable increase in the instance of obesity among children, which will increase costs still further, to the extent that they will become unsustainable for the NHS? May I suggest that we look into the problems caused by vending machines in schools, which are dispensing products full of fat and sugar? Schools are often reluctant to get rid of them because they need the money, but is not the cost to health even worse? From personal experience, I know that eating fat and sugar, as well as the overall amount of food eaten, is what makes people obese.

Miss Johnson: My hon. Friend is a testament to what he advocates. We are certainly looking at vending machines in schools and a pilot is being conducted in one part of the country to dispense much healthier foods from those machines. That is part of the general work that is being done, together with the Department for Education and Skills, to ensure that the food in schools is healthy and continues to promote the health of young people beyond their time at school.

Point of Order

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that yesterday—the fourth day of debate on the Budget—you felt obliged to place a 15-minute limit on speeches, doubtless owing to the great demand to participate in the debate. As ever in my place, I noticed that over a period longer than two hours—between before 7 o'clock and after 9 o'clock—the Chair was obliged, with the exception of one Labour MP whose name and contribution I have quite forgotten, to call eight Conservative Members in succession. The Government Benches were deserted, as were the Liberal Benches. I suggest respectfully that when you are next minded to place a time limit on speeches, you consult the Government to establish whether they will have enough Members to support them—or do you believe that that occasion was simply an example of the fact that of more than 400 Labour Members, fewer than half a dozen were prepared to support their Chancellor on his Budget proposals?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has been in the House a long time. It would be a sorry day if I had to consult the Whips to establish which time limits were appropriate. They might then start to try to manage the Speaker, which would be wrong. The hon. Gentleman should reflect on the fact that Opposition Back Benchers were very lucky yesterday, so there is no need for any complaints from them.

Local Land Charges (Fees)

12.33 pm

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision in relation to fees payable in connection with local land charges.

I am pleased to invite the House to give its leave to introduce a Bill that will enable local authorities in England to determine the level of fees charged for official searches of the local land charges register. Under sections 3 and 5 of the Local Land Charges Act 1975, English and Welsh local authorities are obliged to maintain a register of local land charges. Those are defined under section 1 of the 1975 Act and are matters of a public nature affecting a property that are sufficiently important that anyone interested in the property should be aware of them. The register includes such things as tree preservation orders and the conditions of planning permissions.

Two types of search are included in the 1975 Act. An official search is carried out by the local authority on behalf of the applicant, and is issued following a request submitted on form LLC1. A personal search is a search of the local land charges register carried out by the applicant in person. Under the 1975 Act, the fees to be charged by a local authority are set by the Lord Chancellor's Department with the concurrence of the Treasury. The current fees were set in November 2003, and are £6 for a non-electronic official search of the whole register, £2 for a non-electronic search of part of the register, and £4 for an electronic official search of all or part of the register. For personal searches by the applicant, the charge is £11.

The fees under consideration in the Bill should not be confused with those for inquiries to a local authority in form CON29, which is the standard form used by conveyancers to ask about matters of which the local authority should be aware in respect of a property. Under the Local Authority (Charges for Land Searched) Regulations 1994, the fee for the service using CON29 is set by individual local authorities. When a property is being bought, local searches usually include searches of the local land charges register and inquiries using form CON29. Fees vary, ranging from £80 to £200.

The scope of the Bill is limited to official searches in England. In Wales, the National Assembly is working on proposals to deal with fees in the Principality. Those discussions have not yet been finalised, and it is suggested that, when agreement in the Welsh Assembly has been reached, the responsibility will pass from the Lord Chancellor's Department, using the transfer of functions order under the Government of Wales Act 1998.

This afternoon, I am not asking for those responsibilities to be transferred from the Lord Chancellor's Department to Welsh local authorities; nor am I including in the Bill personal searches, as a review is about to be undertaken by the Lord Chancellor's Department and there is considerable controversy about how such matters should be dealt with.

The 1997 review "Report of an Efficiency Scrutiny of Central Consent Regimes for Local Authorities" and the 2001 local government White Paper "Strong Local Leadership, Quality Public Services" led the Government to announce the devolution of local land charge fees in England in September 2002, as part of a deregulation package. So far, the proposal has not been implemented, and that is why I am introducing this Bill today.

[Mr. David Borrow]

There are considerable variations in how local authorities keep their register of local land charges. Some keep it in electronic form, but only about 40 of more than 400 local authorities can provide full electronic access. One of the Government's public service targets is to achieve 100 per cent. capability of delivery of priority services, such as access to the local land charges register, by electronic means.

A nationally set fee does not reflect accurately the range of costs incurred by local authorities in providing the service. There is great variation in how they provide it and how they are organised internally. Devolving fee-setting to local authorities will encourage them to focus on the real costs of the services and seek efficiency savings. Councils will have to operate on the principle of cost recovery, as happens with CON29. That will prevent them from overcharging for the service, when it is devolved to local authorities, and will force them to keep a real record of the costs incurred in providing the service.

The Bill is supported by the Government and by the all-party Local Government Association. John Rees of the LGA wrote to me a few days ago, asking me to explain to the House the four reasons why the association supports the Bill. The first is that it fulfils a long-standing commitment by the Government, both generally on their deregulation policy and specifically on this provision. The second is that it will allow local authorities to operate on the principle of cost recovery, as is the case under regulations governing the non-statutory part of the local search, which is generally known as CON29. Thirdly, it would allow consumers to gain advantage from the investment that local authorities are making in electronic search delivery. Costs of provision will be lower in due course and those savings can be passed on. Finally, it would be far more efficient both for local government, which would no longer have to spend time making applications for regular increases, and for central Government, who would no longer need to make the necessary orders to change the way in which fees are set.

The current process is hopelessly outmoded. It is not possible to make proposals that reflect the different circumstances that apply in individual authorities; nor is it possible to judge centrally whether fees are reasonable. Local authorities should be given responsibility for setting and justifying the fee.

I have long been a supporter of devolution and believe that the concept that Whitehall always knows best is alien to a real democracy. I have always argued that we should seek to devolve as much power and responsibility to the people as possible. This Bill is only a minor part of that process, but it gives me great pleasure to ask the House to give me leave to introduce it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Borrow, Mr. Colin Pickthall, Mr. Andrew Miller, Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, Kali Mountford, Mr. George Howarth, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Mark Hendrick and Ms Dari Taylor.

LOCAL LAND CHARGES (FEES)

Mr. David Borrow accordingly presented a Bill to make provision in relation to fees payable in connection with local land charges: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 23 April, and to be printed [Bill 78].

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): This is a Budget built on stability that delivers for employment, pensioners, public services and sustained growth for the future. In each area, as I will show, there is the sharpest contrast between our record and prospects for the future and the alternatives put to us by the Opposition. That contrast presents a very clear choice for the country between continued investment and reform in public services and cuts in spending, and between continued economic stability and a return to boom and bust. We relish putting those choices before the country.

On the economy as a whole, we have today the lowest inflation for 30 years, the lowest interest rates for 40 years and more people in employment than ever before. Let us compare that with the situation under the previous Government: 3 million unemployed, double-digit inflation, and interest rates of more than 15 per cent. for over a year. This change in Britain's performance has not come about by accident, but because of the tough economic decisions that we have taken: making the Bank of England independent, sticking to tough fiscal rules and introducing measures such as the sanctions of the new deal. Those decisions have ensured that growth in Britain over the past four years has been higher than that in Japan, Italy and the United States. In 2004, our growth is expected to be double that of France and Germany.

It is right that with such hard-won stability, having accumulated surpluses at the start of the economic cycle, we continue investment and the big job of renewing the country's infrastructure, recognising that it is prudent to borrow to do so, in line with the fiscal rules. Unlike under the Conservative party, which let debt rise to 44 per cent. of gross domestic product, today it stands at just 33 per cent. Whereas the Conservatives borrowed 8 per cent. of GDP, we have reduced that to just 3.4 per cent.

As a result of the tough decisions that we have taken since 1997, we have been able to invest in active labour market policies—investment that is paying off. Employment has risen in every region of the country, and unemployment continues to fall most where previously it was highest. The UK now has one of the strongest labour markets in the world. We have the highest employment and the lowest unemployment of the major industrialised countries. More people are in jobs than ever before. We have tackled the legacy of long-term unemployment—the Tories "price worth paying"—so that long-term youth unemployment has been virtually eradicated.

The new deal is a world-class labour market policy; it has helped more than 1 million people get back to work. The new deal for young people has benefited the economy to the tune of £500 million a year. The shadow Chancellor may laugh at the success of the new deal and the role that it has played in transforming the lives of the young and long-term unemployed people in this country, but he should recognise that an independent study by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research showed that the new deal is saving the economy £500 million a year. The new deal for lone parents is saving the Exchequer £40 million a year. We have a succession of overseas visitors who are keen to emulate the success of the new deal and Jobcentre Plus. The only people who turn their backs on that success are those in the Conservative party.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the UK's productivity in output per person of working age is higher than that in France and Germany, precisely because of our wonderful employment record?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. Programmes such as the new deal and the benefits of our economic stability not only transform the lives of those who were cut out from opportunity and employment under the Conservative party, but benefit the whole economy in higher output and higher welfare for us all, as he suggests. The Conservatives call all that an expensive failure, but we know what was really the expensive failure: the 3 million unemployed under the Conservative party, whose leader, when he was masterminding employment policy, managed to increase unemployment by more than 1 million. Some 1,300 people were added to the claimant count every day, precisely because he did not invest in policies such as the new deal.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The Tory economic record is fairly easy meat, but the Chancellor never talks these days about the balance of payments and the apparent structural balance of payments deficit that the Red Book shows continuing into the future. Does the Secretary of State think that that long-term balance of payments deficit has any implication? Is there any chance that the Government might be blown off course?

Mr. Smith: No, and I will take no lecture on deficits from the Scottish National party. Of course it is important that we continue to improve productivity, that we continue our infrastructural investment and that we invest in skills through the new deal for skills, as set out in the Budget book, so that we continue to improve our international competitiveness, which will result in improvements in our international trading policy. The hon. Gentleman and others should not talk down this country's success, whether in pharmaceuticals, aerospace, the automotive industry or financial services; nor should they ignore the fact that output in our manufacturing sector has been rising over the past four quarters.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): The question was about the current account deficit and the balance of trade. I understand the right hon. Gentleman saying that it does not matter, but did not quite catch why he said that it does not matter. It is the largest deficit for 300 years.

Mr. Smith: I did not say that it does not matter. I said that the measures that we have put in place in terms of economic stability, investment in infrastructure and skills, and ensuring that successful sectors thrive is the best way. We take no lectures from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, whose policies were responsible for getting us into the situation to which I have referred.

Mr. Salmond: If that is the case and the measures will bring improvements, why does the Red Book forecast that the balance of trade in goods and services over the next three years will deteriorate?

Mr. Smith: The Red Book forecasts also that imports and exports will rise at the same rate. It should be evident from my remarks that the situation will be better than it would have been had the Government not made the investment and improvements in skills and competitiveness that we have. The situation would be much worse if the cuts in public spending and investment that the Conservative party wants to implement were put into effect.

We will build on the success of our labour market and other policies, not dismantle them. By introducing the new deal for skills, we will equip people in and out of work with the training that they need to progress in the workplace and to lift themselves and their families out of poverty.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the new deal's huge success in the north-west, and particularly in my constituency, where unemployment is at its lowest ever level—down to 1.9 per cent. It cannot get any better. Can we ensure that the skills found in traditional industries continue to be honed and that unemployment does not return to the levels of the 1980s?

Mr. Smith: Nobody wants a return to the unemployment of the 1980s and the disastrous policies responsible for it. As a consequence of our policies, and demanding though it may be, we might do even better in my hon. Friend's constituency and get unemployment still lower. His point about traditional industries is well made. All industries require investment in information technology and skills. It is no longer viable for smokestack industries to operate under outdated practices. Every industry and service must be high tech and Government policies will help my hon. Friend's constituents and others to succeed in competitively challenging world conditions.

We want to build on our success and to go further in tackling inactivity. We have made strong progress in helping to improve opportunities for lone parents since 1997; 250,000 have been helped into work thanks to the new deal. The lone parent employment rate is above 50 per cent. for the first time, but we want to do more. The biggest barrier facing parents in returning to work is affordable and trusted child care. The Budget will roll out the extended schools pilots to a further four areas, making better use of school facilities to provide child care in areas of high lone parent unemployment.

From October, we will pilot further ways to help lone parents find and stay in work. In eight areas, lone parents will get an extra £20 a week on top of their normal benefits, to cover the costs of more actively looking for work. When they start a job, we will also offer them £40 a week for the first year of employment in addition to other tax credits—making sure that it pays to look for and get a job.

For persons on incapacity benefits, we will extend the pathways to work approach. From next year, we will bring in extra work-focused interviews for persons who have been on incapacity benefit for longer periods, and a new job preparation payment to help people who are taking steps to get a job. Whereas Conservative Governments trebled the numbers on incapacity benefit, we are taking action and investing to help people who want to get back to work—providing opportunities for those written off in the past.

We have never shirked the tough challenge of modernising public services—challenges presented to us by years of under-investment by the previous Conservative Government. I pay tribute to staff throughout the country, who every day are responsible for the labour market successes that I have described—helping people to find work, getting extra money to pensioners and children, and delivering a valued service to the public.

We are investing £2.2 billion in transforming Jobcentre Plus to make it the best welfare to work service in the world. There are new offices, new information technology and 10,000—17 per cent.—more personal advisers on the front line helping more people into work. That investment and the £2.8 billion being spent on my Department's IT systems are modernising the way that we do business and the service that we provide to our clients.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I echo the Secretary of State's praise for staff who do such a good job. Last week, the Chancellor gave the impression that his announcement about swingeing job cuts was news. How does the Secretary of State think his staff felt on turning on the television and hearing that they were going to be sacked?

Mr. Smith: News of staff reductions is bound to cause some uncertainty and anxiety. The investment to which I referred had already been set out in our departmental plans and announced. The Chancellor set out the total number, including a further 12,000 job reductions to 2008. To put that matter in context, mine is a big Department of some 130,000 staff. Implementation of the reforms will be spread over four years, and we will work closely with staff and trade unions in taking them forward. I hope that much can be achieved by natural turnover, which currently accounts for 9,000 staff each year leaving the Department.

The result of our investment and reform will be a leaner, more effective organisation offering a better service to the customer, better value to the taxpayer and more rewarding jobs for our employees as we shift the emphasis from back-office and clerical processing to front-line personal advisory work. A number of personal advisers have told me that that was the job that they wanted when they first joined the service—helping clients, face to face, to move forward in their lives.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Having been to my local Jobcentre Plus, I endorse the right hon. Gentleman's comment that the staff do an excellent job. Is he aware, however, that the Government signed up to a European Union directive that insists on staff consultation in advance of announcements? Why has he breached that EU directive?

Mr. Smith: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his praise in recognition of the accomplishments of Jobcentre Plus. It is for him to take issue with his Front Benchers, who want to abolish so many of the policies that he praises. Before any staff are made redundant, whether voluntarily or even compulsorily if necessary—which I have not ruled out—there will of course be full consultation with staff, in conformity with all relevant agreements and regulations. That will happen not just because that is required but because it is the right thing to do. We have to carry our staff with us during a difficult process of transformation, albeit one that will bring real benefits to customers, taxpayers and staff working conditions and satisfaction.

The Chancellor also made important announcements for pensioners. We have taken action to tackle the inheritance of the last Conservative Government, under whom there were nearly 3 million pensioners in poverty, many of whom were expected to live on just £69 a week. The Conservatives increased the basic state pension once—and only because they simultaneously slammed value added tax on fuel. In contrast, we have increased the basic state pension by £5 for single pensioners and by £8 for couples in real terms; and we have introduced free TV licences for the over-75s, free eye tests, and a winter fuel payment that is worth £200 to every pensioner household and £300 for pensioners over age 80.

In this Budget, we went even further. Recognising the impact that council tax increases have on the fixed incomes of older people, we will pay all households with someone aged over 70 an extra £100 this year. Taken together with the winter fuel payment, households with someone aged over 70 will receive a total of £300 this year, rising to £400 for the over-80s.

On top of that, we continue to make good progress in rolling out pension credit, which is now reaching more than 2.7 million people. The Budget extends the backdating period, and that means that any eligible pensioner making an application will have their credit backdated for up to a year. That is an important extra step to help ensure that pensioners get the money that is rightfully theirs.

As a result of our reforms, we will spend an extra £10 billion next year on pensioners compared with 1997. On average, pensioner households will be £1,350 a year better off in real terms—that is around £26 extra a week. The poorest third will be, on average, £1,750 a year better off, ensuring that more than 1.6 million pensioners have been lifted out of absolute poverty since 1997.

Whereas we have tackled pensioner poverty, the Tory proposals would ensure that the poorest fell further behind. We know that their policies are "wild and uncosted" and that there will have to be more painful cuts to make their sums add up, because the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) have told us so. What they propose is unaffordable, unsustainable and above all unfair.

We will keep up our drive to raise the living standards of all pensioners while helping the poorest most of all. We will also carry forward our programme of pension reform, increasing the rewards for those pensioners who want to work beyond the normal state pension age. We will bring forward the increase in the rate of accrual on deferred state pensions. That means that someone who on retirement at 65 would be entitled to £100 a week will now get £160 if they defer for five years. For the first time from April next year, those who work beyond state pension age will be able to take their deferred state pension as a lump sum.

The forthcoming Finance Bill will also simplify the tax system on personal pension funds by replacing the eight tax regimes for pensions with a single lifetime allowance. That is a fundamental and radical reform that will be of enormous benefit to pension saving in this country. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, we have listened to the concerns of employers who want to do more to support their employees in making decisions about their pensions. I am pleased that we are helping employers to make that advice available by making it tax free up to £150 per employee. That is a new incentive to strengthen the pension partnership.

To conclude: on the whole Budget, as I imagine we are about to hear, the Conservatives are clambering about, straining to find some points of argument that they can hang on to because they have been comprehensively outmanoeuvred on the argument, just as they have been comprehensively outperformed economically on their record in government. The Conservative party is now in total confusion—on core public services, its plans are in chaos. The Conservatives contradict themselves on education, because they are unable to decide whether the derided pupil passports will apply to private school fees. On health, we learned yesterday that they are trying to ditch their private health care subsidy. The Tories' spending plans do not stack up, so they are forced to ditch their flagship policies. The party is in disarray and has nothing to offer the British people.

[Mr. Smith]

In contrast, this Budget locks in the economic stability that we have created since 1997. With inflation, interest rates and unemployment low, we are able to invest for the future with more money for health, education and security. Our investment and reform are delivering better value to the taxpayer, better services to the public and an economy that is the envy of the world. I commend our Budget to the House.

1.4 pm

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I draw the House's attention to my interests that appear in the Register of Members' Interests. I shall begin by identifying issues on which I shall disappoint the Secretary of State by agreeing with some measures in the Budget. Let me take him through one or two of the measures that I welcome. In fact, I welcome some measures that he did not even refer to in his rather thin speech.

For example, I welcome the Chancellor's final abandonment of his obsession with delivering tax credits through the payroll. Five years ago, he believed that it was essential to deliver tax credits through the payroll to transform incentives to get people into jobs. He first abandoned that with the child tax credit, and in his Budget last week, he finally abandoned it with the working tax credit as well. All that metaphysical stuff about how it was essential that these benefits be delivered through the payroll has now been abandoned, and I very much welcome that.

There was something else in the Budget that I welcomed: the simplification of the pension tax regime is an improvement on the current regime. The Chancellor again made a significant concession, but did not want to admit to it. In the face of the protests about the £1.4 million cap and its potential effect on senior managers, he has increased the value of the cap significantly for people with defined benefit schemes. However, instead of doing that in the straightforward way, by increasing the capital sum, he has introduced an ingenious formula for converting the value of a defined benefit pension into a notional sum—the one in 20 formula. No one can actually convert their capital into a pension at a rate of one to 20, but for the purposes of his cap, the Chancellor will assume that they can. To get the sort of pension that would be covered by the scheme, the calculation is that the cap is now up to £2 million, if not more, for people in defined benefit schemes. It is, of course, worth much less for people with personal pensions and defined contribution schemes. Because the Chancellor did not want to make a concession in an open and honest way, he has created a new anomaly in which his provision is more generous for defined benefit than for defined contribution schemes.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way while he is on the theme of abandonment. Will he clarify a confusion that has arisen about the Conservative party's policy on tax relief for private medical insurance? In a speech last year, the leader of the Conservative party, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), said that it fully intended to give private tax relief for medical insurance to the tune of £1 billion. However, yesterday, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) said:

"I can announce that it will not be the policy of the next Conservative Government to offer tax relief to people who take out private medical insurance."—[Official Report, 22 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 595.]

Which is right?

Mr. Willetts: It is not, and has not been, our policy to reinstate the tax relief for private medical insurance. I am happy to place that on the record.

The hon. Lady interrupted me in my paean of praise for the Budget. There is a third item to which I was about to give a grudging welcome. I refer to the £100 for pensioners that, admittedly, is being provided to help them out of the mess of the Chancellor's own creating—the escalation in their council tax bills. That problem has been compounded yet again by the complexity of the means-tested benefit that is supposed to help pensioners.

The take-up of council tax benefit has been declining, and more than 1 million pensioners who are entitled to it do not receive it. In fact, when the Chancellor recognised in his Budget speech the failure of means-tested benefits to help pensioners with high council tax bills and introduced a universal payment for all pensioners over 70, I wondered whether he had recognised a wider strategic point. In the words of Help the Aged:

"There would be no need for gifts like this if the government was to review its fixation with means-testing."

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): While the hon. Gentleman is in the unusual mood of agreeing with the Government, does he agree with them, and me, that at this time of heightened terrorism in the world, we need maximum defences on all fronts to combat it? Does he agree with his own party, which has announced a freeze on defence expenditure in cash terms? If so, which element would he cut at this terrible time?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman ought to be aware of the distinction between outputs and inputs. We are committed to efficiency in the public services—the Prime Minister used to talk about that in the old days. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) has not made a specific statement on defence spending, but we are committed overall to ensuring the efficient delivery of public services.

My attempt to find common ground with the Government on the Budget does not seem have to have met much of a welcome.

Mr. Andrew Smith rose—

Mr. Willetts: I was going to move on to some criticisms of the Budget, but of course I shall give way to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman made a point about inputs and outputs in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), but will he give us a clear yes or no answer? Is it the policy of those on the Conservative Front Bench to keep defence spending flat in cash terms?

Mr. Willetts: My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset set out our public spending plans clearly in his statement a few weeks ago. He set out the areas in which we would be able to increase spending in real terms—on health and education—and outlined an overall framework for total public expenditure. However, he did not make a statement specifically on the defence budget.

On pensions, I am afraid that I found the Budget sadly lacking. The Chancellor failed yet again to recognise the scale of the crisis in funded pensions. Just about everyone recognises that we cannot carry on with more and more pensioners on means-tested benefits, and the erosion of funded pensions. Everyone from the Adam Smith Institute to Mr. Alan Pickering recognises that the way forward is to reform benefits so as to reverse the spread of means-testing and to produce new incentives to save, so that people are encouraged to build up more funded occupational pensions. Under this Government, the country is heading in the opposite direction, with more means-testing and a decline in funded pension savings, and nothing in the Budget will reverse that trend.

The Chancellor is being optimistic in assuming that corporation tax receipts will increase to the extent suggested by table C8 of the Red Book—the light reading to which we have all been turning in the midnight hour. He assumes that corporation tax receipts will increase from £28.7 billion this year to £34.8 billion next year. It would be interesting to hear why he believes that there will be such an extraordinary recovery in corporation tax receipts, given that many companies will have to put more money into their pension funds to rescue them from the effects of the £5 billion tax that the Chancellor has imposed on them.

There was nothing in the Budget on wind-ups. We wanted it to include measures to tackle the problems facing the 60,000 people who had hoped that after the collapse of their pensions and the disappearance of their hopes for a decent retirement, the Government would examine ways of assisting them out of serious financial distress. Several rumours went round. For example, the Chancellor was reported to be interested in a proposal made by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), in which we have also been interested, to use some of the unclaimed assets held by building societies and banks to set up a fund to help people in such circumstances. We read that the Chancellor is targeting the unclaimed assets, but, sadly, not to help with the problem of pension wind-ups. There could be no better use of the unclaimed assets than in helping to tackle that problem, and it will be a great pity if the Chancellor takes money from the unclaimed assets but does not use it for that purpose.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): I am worried that the hon. Gentleman might have inadvertently—I stress the word "inadvertently"—misled the House. I was looking at the Conservative party website last night—honestly, I am that sad—and the quote from the shadow Chancellor is very clear. He says that there would be increases in the budgets for health and education but that those of all other Departments would be frozen in cash terms for two years. He admits that that would mean tough decisions. Will the hon. Gentleman correct what he said if it turns out to be wrong?

Mr. Willetts: My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset was setting out an overall framework for those Departments. In his announcement on public spending the other week, he specifically stated that there would be scope for reallocating money among specific Departments. The hon. Gentleman would have been better occupied in studying the fine print in the Chancellor's Red Book than in making up such questions on the basis of our website.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson rose—

Mr. Willetts: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman once, but I am in a generous mood, so I shall give way to him once more.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman is most generous. We are trying to get at some of the detail of what the Conservatives have in mind for defence. A copy of "Community News" put out by the Conservatives says that we should not have put as much money as we have—£20 billion—into the Eurofighter. I can make the article available to the hon. Gentleman. Would he scrap the Eurofighter? Would that be one of the specific cuts?

Mr. Willetts: Let me quote from the authoritative statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset to calm Labour Members' anxieties, given that, just for once, they are troubled about defence. He said:

> "I recognise, moreover, that there will inevitably be cases in which particular programmes, or even the expenditure of whole departments, will need to rise at a rate faster than this."

Those words are from his original statement. He set out an overall envelope, but he did not set figures for individual Departments.

I now turn to what the Government are doing to encourage saving, because not a word on that subject passed the Chancellor's lips throughout his statement. He has not referred to saving in his last two Budgets; in fact, he has been attacking saving. He has attacked the form of savings that many people have been using, and that the Secretary of State previously encouraged people to take out.

Let me quote what the Secretary of State said in a debate on the subject in 2002, when a Conservative Member asked him a question about individual savings accounts. Asked what vehicle he would recommend people to save with and how he would encourage people to save, he replied:

> "The hon. Lady specifically asked what we could offer to younger people to ensure that they were saving, and I quite reasonably pointed to ISAs".

He recommended ISAs. He added:

> "The answer is the ISA, a more flexible vehicle which is attracting more savings, especially from younger people."—[Official Report, 2 July 2002; Vol. 388, c. 103.]

The Budget, however, represents an attack on the ISA. There has been an abolition of tax credits on ISA dividends, and a cut in the size of equity ISAs from £7,000 to £5,000. The cash mini-ISA will also be cut from £3,000 to £1,000. Does the Secretary of State stand by the advice that he would have given a young person 18 months ago, in the light of the depredations that the Chancellor has made in the specific form of saving in which the right hon. Gentleman was trying to encourage people to participate?

[Mr. Willetts]

Let me also ask the Secretary of State about his welfare-to-work initiatives. As he knows, when I am not reading the fine print of the Chancellor's Red Book, I plough through the Department for Work and Pensions' evaluations of its welfare-to-work schemes. Ministers always come to the House to announce new programmes, but they never admit to the House what their evaluations show about the performance of existing programmes. If Ministers take any account of what used to be called evidence-based policies—they used to be proud of those—why does the Secretary of State not explain the latest research report to the House?

The report, published last month, is entitled "Evaluation of Lone Parent Work Focused Interviews: Final findings from administrative data analysis"; it is a light read if ever there was one. It says on page 12:

"The introduction of Lone Parent Work Focused Interviews"— the Jobcentre Plus stuff that the Secretary of State has just been talking about again—

"brought no detectable change in exit rates from"

"for eligible new or repeat claimants".

It has had no effect. Why does the Secretary of State keep on churning out new initiatives that endlessly require further extension of compulsory interviews, when his own evidence shows that most of them have had no discernable effect? That is the challenge to which he needs to respond.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has just suggested that it is important to review recent documentation and assess it properly. Would he therefore care to review the statement by the shadow Chancellor on 16 February, in which he said that there should be a "zero per cent. growth" in the defence and Home Office budgets? Would he care to compare that with the view of the shadow Defence Secretary, who said that that would be a savage cut? Which is it? Is the shadow Chancellor going to cut the defence budget or the Home Office budget?

Mr. Willetts: I have already clearly explained what my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor said in his statement on our public expenditure plans. We can see from the Secretary of State's brief speech, and from interventions, that the Government do not have a programme to reform public services, to tackle the crisis in our pensions or to avert the tax rises that would be inevitable if they were in office for a third term. Instead, we have spin, spin, spin from the Government.

Mr. Webb: Before he was interrupted, the hon. Gentleman was saying that the Government's programmes to get lone parents off welfare to work had been unsuccessful. To fill the hole in his pensions policies he aims to save £400 million a year by getting lone parents with secondary school-age children back into work. What research evidence makes him think that he can raise £400 million by doing that?

Mr. Willetts: We have clear evidence that when lone parents are older and their children are of secondary school age, for them to go out to work is in the best interests of the children, as outcomes for them are better We know from the introduction of jobseeker's allowance that nothing beats a simple, clear requirement that people should actively seek work. The Government have skirted that issue ever since they took office, but we would address it directly with our reform. That is the difference, and it is an important one.

I turn to the main activity in which the Chancellor has been engaged in his Budget, and in which he has engaged again today—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Before my hon. Friend moves on, will he say something more about savings, the issue that he has just addressed? It is disturbing that people are not being encouraged to save. Why, despite all the words used by the Chancellor in the past, are there no measures to encourage saving in the Budget?

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is right. We have just about the lowest savings ratio on record, and the Red Book shows that there is no prospect of improvement. The Budget documents show the savings ratio as 5.25 per cent. in 2003, 5 per cent. in 2004 and 5.5 per cent. in 2005–06. Those are historically low levels.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in 1989 it was 4.9 per cent., which is the lowest level of all?

Mr. Willetts: The Secretary of State knows that the savings ratio under this Government has fallen from the 10 per cent. that they inherited from us to approximately 5 per cent. now. There are no measures in the Budget to do anything to reverse that. The average savings ratio since 1997 is lower than it was during our period in office, and that serious problem needs to be tackled.

I shall challenge the Chancellor on the new sport in which he is engaged— fox hunting. He wishes to shoot our fox; that was the spin put on the Budget. We were told that that was its purpose: it had nothing to do with improving the performance of the British economy or avoiding future tax increases, but was all to do with shooting our fox. The Chancellor is engaged in an activity more redolent of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) than of Labour Members, but they are all engaged in fox hunting.

Let us get on the trail and see whether, by suddenly discovering the importance of reducing the overhead costs of government, they have carried out the brilliant political manoeuvre that they think they have. For years, the Chancellor has denied that there is a problem with waste and inefficiency; it is Opposition Members who have pressed for action on the problem of waste and inefficiency in our public services. Now, the Chancellor takes great pride in turning up and announcing in the Budget that he has suddenly realised that there is a great problem with waste, overhead costs and excessive numbers of civil servants, which he is going to reduce.

Will the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions provide a little more information about the announcements that were made? On the day of the Budget, he announced that he would reduce the number of civil servants, and said on the radio:

"I haven't ruled out the possibility of some compulsory redundancies."

The Chancellor said in his Budget statement that

"the Secretary for Work and Pensions is announcing today for his Department a gross reduction of 40,000 staff posts, a redeployment of 10,000 posts to new priorities and thus an overall reduction over four years of 30,000 posts."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 331.]

That is what many civil servants heard on their radios, but we know what the Government think about such sudden announcements of redundancies, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

"I am not prepared to have our workers hear on the radio that they will lose their jobs or find that they have already lost their jobs through a text message."—[Official Report, 14 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 822.]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is so het up about such announcements that she will penalise employers who do such appalling things. The Government have introduced legislation to fine employers who announce redundancies without proper consultation, and she said:

"I want these changes to lead to a 'no surprise' culture"— the Chancellor has not caught up with that, has he?—

"where employers and employees discuss common ground and find solutions to mutual problems. I want to see an end to the climate where people only hear about job losses from the media over their breakfast."

What, then, is the Chancellor up to, announcing redundancies in this way?

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Like many honest citizens, I was immensely impressed by a recent photo opportunity involving the Leader of the Opposition in which great phalanxes of cardboard cut-outs wearing bowler hats symbolising imminently redundant civil servants were paraded for the cameras. Would the hon. Gentleman disassociate himself from that?

Mr. Willetts: That was a recruitment freeze. We know how to do these things properly, which is the point that we are making—but I am afraid that the Government do not. The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has the defence that the announcement was not new. The Chancellor did not say so, but that is what we have discovered. I have been digging in the departmental spending plans, and in the latest annual report the Secretary of State said:

"The strategic aim is to reduce the Department's workforce from just 131,000 whole-time equivalents in post at April 2003"— the figure is about the same now—

"to around 112,000 by March 2006 as the benefits of a significant programme of change and modernisation are realised."

That is what the Government were going to do 18 months ago, but we now know that those plans date back as far as 2002, which is when savings were first announced. What have they been doing in the two years since they first announced that 18,000 jobs were to be cut? A departmental spokesman was asked how many of those 18,000 job losses had been implemented since 2002, and she replied:

"That 18,000 was only a proposal."

The cut was "only a proposal", so the Government have not done anything about it. The Secretary of State must tell us why we should believe him this time when he claims that he is going to do something about it. He says that the savings are all due to the miraculous use of IT, but I warn him that his Department's record on saving money and staff through the effortless and efficient introduction of IT system leaves something to be desired.

The new computers at the Child Support Agency are still not working. Are we going to save money in that way? Will we make savings with the computers that delivered the new child tax credits so smoothly? The national insurance recording system did not send out any notification to people telling them to pay their voluntary national insurance contributions. Will the superb efficiency of that IT system be the means by which money is saved? The Government do not know how they are going to save the money, which is why for the past two years they have been announcing 18,000 staff reductions, yet have not achieved a single one.

Mr. Salmond: I have been listening closely to this part of the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I am still not clear whether those on the Tory Front Bench think the Minister is sacking too few civil servants, or too many.

Mr. Willetts: We want an efficient civil service, and I believe that it is possible to reduce staff numbers in the Department for Work and Pensions. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman, and Ministers, how it can be done. The only real way is not through gimmicks, proposals from which no action follows, or empty hopes based on IT systems. The only way is to reform the benefits system. That is how to save money. I shall give the hon. Gentleman some figures.

The average weekly administrative cost of delivering a payment of income support—one of those complicated means-tested benefits that the Chancellor loves so much—is £4.20. The administrative cost of delivering the basic state pension per week is 55p. The cost is hardly more than one tenth, if instead of complicated means-tested benefits, straightforward and simple benefits are paid through the basic state pension. The reason why the Chancellor cannot deliver savings is that he is always making the benefits system more complicated and spreading means-tested benefits. If he reformed the benefits system as we propose, it would indeed be possible to make savings. One makes savings by making tough decisions on the reform of benefits.

Rob Marris rose—

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: No. I should like the Secretary of State to explain to the House why we should believe that this time, Ministers will be able to save money on the overhead costs of government, when we know from their own evidence how they have failed before. I have the targets that they set in 2000 for "modernising welfare delivery". The aim was to "introduce an improved, integrated modern service for delivering benefits".

Those were their 2000 objectives. What happened?

One target was to "reduce the average cost of processing retirement pension claims and maintaining the caseload by 20 per cent."

The response was that the Department would not meet that target. Another target was to "reduce the average cost of processing Minimum Income Guarantee claims".

The outcome was that the Department would not meet that target, either. The Department also aimed to "ensure that 90 per cent. of MIG claims are processed within 13 days".

The outcome was that the Department would not meet that target.

The Government have failed to meet their targets in the past. There is no evidence that they have taken the measures necessary to deliver the targets they have now set. The only way to do that is by serious reform of benefits. The only way to save money on the overhead costs of government is to engage in a serious process of public service reform. There is nothing about that in the Budget. That is why the Budget fails to rise to the challenge of the growing costs of government. That is why the Opposition have the correct approach and Ministers do not.

James Purnell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I have your guidance? If I believe the shadow spokesman inadvertently misled the House, and I have a quote that shows that, but he was not able to take an intervention from me during his speech, what recourse do I have to enable him to correct the record?

Mr. McLoughlin: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be a good idea if the hon. Gentleman came to Prime Minister's questions, where we see that every week?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Let me respond to the first point of order. The point that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell) raises is largely a matter for debate. The words that an hon. Member chooses to use in the Chamber must be the ones that he decides to use, and he must take great care with those words.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): I congratulate the Government on yet another fine Budget in a long series, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his intellectual and sheer physical stamina as he completed his eighth Budget. I think that it is true to say that come July this year he will have overtaken Lloyd George in the office of Chancellor, and looking a little further ahead he might even have Gladstone in his sights, who under Lord Derby's Administration, I think, did seven years and succeeded him as Prime Minister in the eighth. I am not sure my right hon. Friend would wish me to pursue that scenario any further on this occasion, but it is already clear that the Chancellor is entering the record books for the length of his chancellorship.

The Chancellor's achievements are much more than that. This is the longest period of growth that we have had. We have stability, and all the benign aspects of the present economic situation—jobs, interest rates, growth, low inflation—are derived from that overriding objective. We have avoided stop-go, which is a particularly vicious form of economic development. It leads to lost output and makes for terrible inefficiency as businesses wind down when they have only just wound up with investment that can no longer be used. A third aspect of stop-go that is particularly pernicious is that in the stop phase, it is always the capital projects that bear the heaviest burden of the cut. That has led to the progressive decline in our infrastructure.

We tried to deal with that. Some of us remember—some of us were even in the House in the '60s and '70s—under successive Labour and Tory Administrations the Wilson attempt through planning and the Heath attempt through the dash for growth. Both tried to get away from stop-go and, sadly for the country, both failed to do so. Then came the '80s and the '90s and the abandonment of any pretence of credence in investment in the public sector. It was left to deteriorate, with the result that as we enter the new century we must pick up the pieces and try to put back together again not just British Rail, but the outdated infrastructure in our hospitals, our schools and all of our transport. Those are the three prime areas.

Uniquely now we have achieved stability. Uniquely now we have a forward programme. Judging by the Chancellor's Budget arithmetic, there is every chance that we can sustain it and make a real difference. That could not be done in the year or two since we got going. It is no good expecting that after two years of high spending in the health service, we will suddenly reach the European level, the French level or whatever is considered the optimum that we should reach, at least in terms of the service provided. That cannot be achieved so rapidly, but we seem to have the prospect of it.

Just as we are about to sustain that programme and get a national effort behind it—and get the CBI behind it, as well as the unions—the Opposition mount an attack on it. We have hardly got going, but already they want to prove it is not working. On the basis of some tentative, experimental and sometimes quite absurd analysis, they are trying to undermine the national programme of rejuvenation and reinvestment.

Rob Marris: My hon. Friend mentioned earlier his concerns about the Opposition's plans regarding defence spending, and my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell) mentioned the Conservative party website. May I remind my hon. Friend briefly what that website says? The right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is quoted as saying:

"The fifth component of the Medium Term Expenditure Strategy relates to all programme expenditure covered by departmental expenditure limits outside the NHS and school budgets.

I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues that the baseline for spending across all of these departmental budgets will be 0 per cent. growth for the first two years".

He goes on:

"I fully accept that holding programme spending within departmental expenditure limits other than the NHS and schools to a zero increase for the first two years and to what amounts to a zero real terms increase thereafter is a tough constraint."

Is that what my hon. Friend was talking about as regards defence expenditure and the Opposition proposals for that?

Mr. Robinson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that telling and pertinent intervention. I tried in vain to get either of the Opposition spokesmen in today's debate to tell us what they meant. One of my hon. Friends pointed out that they were threatening to axe the Eurofighter project to save £20 billion. If only they would come clean with the House, we would know where they stood. I am less concerned about those proposals, however, because I do not think that the Conservatives are ever going to get the chance to implement them. They are muddled, contradictory and impractical, and I think that they will be exposed as such during the months leading up to the general election.

I am seriously concerned about the Conservatives' mentality: as soon as they see the Government's success in investing to restore our schools, hospitals and transport systems, they try to prove that because our approach involves the public sector, it will not work. What grounds do they cite for those criticisms? One is the Office for National Statistics report. Normally, an ONS report would be taken very seriously and checked, but this one was never intended to be such a document. It was put out to provide an experimental look at the issues—and it is correct that we should monitor expenditure programmes that involve huge sums. I agree that we should get value for money and ensure that we are achieving the targets on which our money is being spent.

Let me just point out a few aspects of the ONS report to which the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and the shadow Chancellor referred. The measurements used in the report are "new" and "experimental"—that suddenly seems to have become the holy gospel—and they use a measure of output which is absurd. The hon. Member for Havant mentioned measuring outputs instead of inputs, so he will agree with that. The measurements also invite us to equate success with having bigger class sizes, more fires and more disease. That seems to be the way it works. The suggestion is that that methodology is bound to work. In fairness, the hon. Gentleman was trying to make this point. Quality is not mentioned, but what could be more vital to all our public services than quality?

When the shadow Chancellor tries to suggest that the difference between the investment going in and the output is equivalent to an inflation rate five times the national rate, he is of course using the same flawed methodology to reach that conclusion. His argument therefore has no intellectual legitimacy whatever. I hope that a better effort will be made by Sir Tony Atkinson, who has rightly been appointed by the Chancellor to examine these issues. I look forward to his report being produced in the summer. Let us hope that we can make sensible progress in that direction.

In yesterday's debate, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health made some telling points against those who were trying to suggest that the investment that we are making is much greater than any output that is being achieved. I shall not read out all the figures that my right hon. Friend gave to the House yesterday, but some are well worth repeating. He drew attention to the fact that there were 113,000 more cataract operations last year than in 1997—a 70 per cent. increase.—and 19,000 more knee operations—a 69 per cent. increase. There were 950,000 more planned hospital admissions last year than in 1997—a 22 per cent. increase—and 6,000 extra heart operations will have been carried out by April. All that seems to be a very good indicator of the improvements that are being made.

Let us forget what the precise objectives were—I hope that we can also get away from the distortions that they can lead to in clinical priorities and in the organisation of hospitals—and consider the increases that are being achieved, even without referring to the 6.3 million people dealt with by NHS Direct and the 400,000 operations. I speak anecdotally when I say that many people in my constituency and elsewhere are finding a great improvement in the promptness, cleanliness and up-to-dateness of NHS care, along with the new hospitals resulting from the record hospital break-in programme. So there is no need to listen to the Conservatives' rubbishing, pessimism and downright irresponsible criticism. All we need to do is go out, look at the hospitals, and talk to the nurses.

There is a problem with consultants and with the European working time directive, which I shall come to in a moment. First, however, I want to say a word demolishing the argument about the European Central Bank paper, of which the Leader of the Opposition made much and in respect of which he published a plea in a national newspaper for help in solving the £70 billion mystery. That seems like a waste of money to me, but Tory party funds are obviously being replenished at a rate of knots. I am not sure that I can help him in terms of the way he posed his question, but I can help him in a different way.

The European Central Bank study is not an official bank study; the bank publishes side papers such as these which are written by people who happen to work for the bank. In no sense does it carry the imprimatur—let alone the authority—of the World Bank. It shows, among other things, that the UK, compared with about 20 countries—all the major European ones, America and the rest—has the most efficient transport system. That must give us a resounding sense of confidence. It also states that we come third, in terms of public sector figures, in administration, health, education and infrastructure. If the Leader of the Opposition has identified a mystery surrounding £70 billion, let me tell him how to find a $700 billion one. If we take the conclusion of the report on transport and apply it to the United States, we discover that, if the US were as efficient as we are, there would be a $700 billion problem for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to go after. Why is it that we are so much more efficient, and why are the United States wasting resources that, on that basis, could be calculated at roughly $700 billion?

Those examples, the ONS and ECB reports, do not give any objective grounds at this stage for suggesting that the huge investment that we are putting into the three priority areas is not producing the results that it must produce. We all have a deep national and personal responsibility to see that those results are achieved. I hope that the Tory attitude to this will soon be exposed as irresponsible. However, I would say to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Front Bench that, in terms of getting ahead with the proper analysis and monitoring of what we are getting for our public investment—now that it is on such a scale and can be sustained for a period that would really make an impact after the years of neglect—they should set up a small monitoring team in the Department, along the lines of whatever Tony Atkinson comes up with, to ensure that we have authoritative grounds to prove not only that the programme is delivering as we expect it to but to expose the hypocrisy and shallowness of the Tory Opposition towards this major national input.

I should like to put to my Front-Bench colleagues one final point on the health service. It was not mentioned yesterday, and I want to take the opportunity to raise it now. There is a problem with the European working time directive, in relation to junior doctors and to the earlier changes that were made, which will pose a great challenge to the health service that could result in a drop in the level of service that it can provide. I would like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to consider the provisions that we have in place to meet the requirements of the working time directive in relation to junior doctors, the spread of the provision and the worry among many consultants about the speed at which the changes are happening following the earlier structural changes. It is possible that, despite the money going in, we shall not do as well as we could if we could find a way of minimising the effect of the working time directive. That is a major consideration, and a personal worry of mine. I have many friends who are surgeons who never stop lecturing me on it, so I hope I am allowed to lecture my right hon. and hon. Friends in turn.

I am very pleased that, for the first time since the war, we can look forward to a sustained programme to put things right that have been wrong for so long. The Government can take great pride in that, and I would simply say to them, "Hold your nerve, and make sure that everything is clearly explained and justified as we go forward."

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): When my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) responded to the Chancellor's Budget statement last week he began in characteristically generous fashion. I propose to do the same. He begin by saying that

> "the Chancellor's finest hour came in his first week in office in 1997, when he made the Bank of England independent."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 340.]

My hon. Friend is too much of a statesman to make the partisan point that that proposal came in the Liberal Democrat, not the Labour or Tory, manifesto, but I feel no such compunction. I am certainly happy to argue that the Chancellor's finest decision was taken from our manifesto, a lesson that all Departments would do well to learn from.

I welcome aspects of the Budget that have had relatively little attention, including potential simplification of tax treatment of pensions. Sweeping away eight different tax treatments must in principle be right. We have quibbles about the detail, but the idea of a simple method of assessing tax relief for pensions is a step in the right direction. We welcome the proposal, for which Liberal Democrats have long pressed, that people should be able to draw a pension and carry on working for the same employer, perhaps part-time, with no penalty. That seems entirely right and is very much in the spirit of flexible retirement, whereby retirement is not a cliff edge but a process. Those are the sort of things that we have wanted for some time. That sort of change needs to be allied with action on age discrimination, which, yet again, is sadly lacking in the Government's programme this year. Even so, one out of two is not too bad.

I want to focus on what I used to think was a Labour value: fairness. If Budgets are about tax, a Labour Budget ought surely to be about fair tax, yet this one failed to do anything to redress the fact that the poorest people in our society pay higher and higher proportions of their income in tax, while the highest earners pay smaller proportions. People simply cannot believe that the poorest in our society pay a bigger proportion of their income in tax, and not merely more than the national average but more than the richest pay. What sort of tax system can possibly lead to that?

The Office for National Statistics has produced estimates of the proportion of income taken in tax from the poorest 10 per cent. in society. In 1996–97—these are the figures inherited by the Government—the poorest 10 per cent. paid 44 per cent. of their income in tax. That is astonishing. Who would have thought, however, that five years later, under a Labour Government, 44 per cent. would have risen to 53 per cent? That is incredible. What, meanwhile, has happened to the richest tenth? They paid 33 per cent. of their income in tax, and they still pay 33 per cent. The lowest income earners in society are therefore paying a bigger proportion of their income in tax. How can that be right?

The Chancellor put his finger on one reason for that in his Budget speech. He mentioned council tax and how unfair it is, and he said that he would do something about it. Liberal Democrats thought that he might actually do something about it—that he had heeded not only our warnings, at last, but those from other organisations, which say that it is time the council tax was replaced by a fair tax related to ability to pay. Local taxes make a major contribution to the heavy tax burden of the lowest paid and pensioners. Out of the 53 per cent. of their income that goes in tax, 12 per cent. goes in local tax after rebates: even after council tax benefit has been taken into account, the poorest people in our society pay 12 per cent. of their income in local taxes. How can that possibly be sensible?

In a Budget debate, it is appropriate to look at what has happened to our tax system over the longer term. Over the past couple of decades, direct taxes, which relate to people's ability to pay, have gone down. The standard rate of income tax was 33 per cent., I think, when Mrs. Thatcher came to power, and it has fallen by a third. National insurance rates have gone down and come back up again, and are broadly what they were about two decades ago. As a result, the overall balance is that direct taxes, which reflect what one can afford to pay, have gone down, but indirect taxes have shot up. VAT has more than doubled. The balance of the tax system has therefore shifted. Those on lower incomes pay more tax, while those on higher incomes pay less. Who in this Chamber thinks that that is fair?

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): Mr. Blair.

Mr. Webb: My hon. Friend suggests from a sedentary position that the Prime Minister might feel that it is.

The Budget was a missed opportunity to reduce the tax burden on those who are least able to pay. What did we get from the Chancellor? We got a pre-election bribe of £100. According to his spending plans, that £100 is not factored into any future spending plans. We can therefore assume only that it is intended to keep him going up to the next Budget. Britain's pensioners do not want to have to wait for the annual rabbit from the hat that the Chancellor produces at the end of his Budget to get headlines. Pensioners deserve more respect than is shown by their having to wait for the annual gimmick to get a decent income. They should have a decent income as of right, and we should have a fair local tax system, under which that £100 would not have been necessary.

Mr. Watson: Is that a different £100 to the £100 that the Liberal Democrats promised to cut off council tax bills at the recent Brent, East by-election?

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman will find that the £100 proposed by the Liberal Democrats in our last alternative Budget was not just for pensioners but for all council tax payers, as part of the transition to a local income tax. If he is saying that he supports that transition to a fair local tax system, he and I are probably of one mind.

Mr. Watson: To clarify matters, I will send the hon. Gentleman the "Focus" leaflet from the Brent, East by-election, in which the Liberal Democrats said that they would cut council tax bills by £100. If that was not a bribe, what is?

Mr. Webb: I have just pointed out that the £100 from the Chancellor will not continue beyond one year. The departmental spending plans are for £475 million for one year, then a general election, then nothing. That looks a bit like a bribe. We want to cut the burden of local taxation on those least able to pay, every year, through moving to a local income tax system. That has been our consistent policy for a long time.

There was something odd about the way in which the Chancellor presented the argument for the £100. He was saying, "Because council tax is such a burden on pensioners and others, we will put in £100 this year." But this was the year in which we were told that the Government had given extra largesse to local authorities and in which increases in council tax would be far lower. Why, therefore, if the £100 is needed now, was it not given last year, when council tax went up far more than it did this year? Well, of course, the answer is that that was two years before the election, not one.

The Chancellor not only offered the £100 but planned a 7 per cent. council tax rise for next year. Is not that a classic example of giving with one hand and taking with the other? For someone paying council tax of about £1,000, the 7 per cent. will be about £70, so it will not be long before the increase that has just been given is taken away.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House how those least able to pay will benefit from the £934 average council tax per dwelling this year charged by Liberal Democrat councils, which compares with £818 for Labour councils and £1,008 for Conservative councils?

Mr. Webb: It is sad when a senior Treasury Minister must resort to such implausible comparisons. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will answer the question. Council tax fills the difference between what councils spend and what they get from central Government, which determines about three quarters of the amount. We all know that the Government have reordered grant allocations to favour, as I recollect—I am a bit hazy—urban authorities or Labour authorities. As the National Audit Office found when it looked at last year's large council tax rises, when grants went up substantially, council taxes did not have to increase by so much.

Mr. Willetts: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one reason why the Chief Secretary's figures were so misleading was that he did not allow for different bands and different composition of properties in different areas? If he looks at the average band D council tax in relation to control of different local authorities, he will get a rather different picture.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is right. In my local authority area, the average house is in band B, but that is not reflected in the figures that are normally quoted, which can be used to support almost any argument. The truth is that council tax is an unfair tax. The Chancellor acknowledged that in coming up with a one-off gimmick at the end of his Budget statement. The real answer, though, is a decent pension for pensioners and a fair system of local taxation.

Let me say something about staff cuts at the Department for Work and Pensions. What has not been mentioned so far, although I think the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) alluded to it, is that the Department employed 97,000 people in the Government's first year in office, whereas it will employ 130,000 in the current year. The number of staff has risen by a third, and we are expected to applaud the Department for making tough choices in reducing it by about a quarter. Why has staffing risen so much, given that the Department is always telling us that unemployment is down and fewer lone parents are on income support? Surely that should mean that the Department needs fewer people to administer all the benefit claims.

As the hon. Member for Havant said, the fact is that the Government have made the system so complicated that numerous people are needed to do all the sums. Moreover, the Government highlight the claimant count in relation to unemployment, while glossing over the fact that the number of people claiming disability-related benefits is on the increase. Many young people who are not included in the claimant count may not be in paid employment but are economically active in some other way. The Government claim that everything in the garden is rosy, but that does not translate into less administration for the Department because there are an awful lot of people on benefits to whom they do not refer.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I apologise for missing the first part of the hon. Gentleman's speech. I was called out of the Chamber. Does he accept that the rate of flow on to disability benefits has fallen by a quarter since the Government came to power? The total number of people on benefits has continued to rise, but it has done so at a diminishing rate because of the length of time for which people stay on those benefits. That is why our pathway to work proposals to help people out of inactivity and into work are so important.

Mr. Webb: It is always gratifying when the second derivative is raised in the House. When that happens, I feel that calculus was worth it after all. The Secretary of State is right in saying that the rate of inflow has slowed, but it is a question not of when people go on to benefits, but of how long they stay on them; the outflow rate is critical. I realise that the Government have a programme to tackle the difficulty of getting some of these folk off benefits, but successive Governments have experienced the problem of folk flowing on to incapacity benefit and its predecessors and then getting stuck. The Government are overselling what has happened, especially in the case of young people for whom sickness is less of an issue.

Mr. Willetts: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Secretary of State's figures were misleading. The average time on incapacity benefit has increased since the so-called reform involving the introduction of means-testing for new claims. People are reluctant to go off the benefit, because they fear that if they start claiming it again, they will be means-tested. The Secretary of State mentioned the linking rules, but those must be applied for in advance, and many people do not do so.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is right in every particular, although I seem to recall that he was very influential when means-testing was applied to what was then invalidity benefit, when company pensions were offset against invalidity pensions, so he is not entirely blameless on that front.

Mr. Willetts: I was trying to help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Webb: Yes, and that is all the thanks the hon. Gentleman gets.

The hon. Gentleman was entirely right when he spoke about the savings in staff numbers at the DWP that were supposed to have been made through technology. Excuse me, as my children say, but where are these efficient computer systems? Are they in the Child Support Agency, where even Ministers are beginning to despair of the system ever working?

Mr. Watson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: I have already given way twice to the hon. Gentleman.

Are the efficient computer systems in the tax credit system, which was a complete shambles at the outset? I have not seen a single efficient computer system in the Department, yet the cost of tens of thousands of workers has supposedly been saved. Our principal concern is the welfare of those receiving benefits and pensions. They are entitled to an efficient service. If the Secretary of State plans staff cuts on the basis of efficient computers that do not exist, our constituents will suffer in terms of their pensions, benefits and tax credits.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman really telling us that he would cut the numbers by far more?

Mr. Webb: No. We are saying that we do not support cuts unless it can be demonstrated that efficiency has been delivered to our constituents. We do not support the idea of cutting staff when IT systems are not producing a more efficient service.

Our proposals for reform of tax and pension credit would reduce the need for bureaucracy. If we provided a better state pension and reduced dependence on means-testing, the administrative burden would be smaller. We propose to cut administration and bureaucracy, but we will make no hypothetical assumptions that computer systems will be improved.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman implied that the number of DWP staff—97,000—had risen by 30 per cent. in three years. Since the Department has existed for only three years, perhaps he could clarify that. As for computerisation—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will correct me if I am wrong—I believe that the Department has 36 computerisation projects on the go, as well as those established since 1997. The hon. Gentleman mentioned two or three that have undoubtedly had problems—I speak as a member of the IT Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions—but many DWP computer systems are working well. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman has not heard about those simply because they are working well.

Mr. Webb: As the hon. Gentleman is knowledgeable about these matters, I am sure he will agree that the computer projects that affect the vast majority of our constituents are the tax credit computer, which affects every family in the land, and the pension credit computer, which will probably affect every pensioner in the land if the Chancellor has his way and which affects half of them already. The Child Support Agency computer affects 1 million parents with care, and probably a further million. These are substantial computer systems, all of which have a track record of being a shambles. The national insurance recording system, which applies to every man, woman and child as well as several million dead people, is a shambles too. I am delighted to learn that another 30 systems may be working, but I think that the record is bad enough as it stands.

The hon. Gentleman asked about my statistics relating to staff numbers. According to table 6 of the DWP report, headed "Staff numbers 1997–98 to 2005–06", which includes whole-time equivalents, the figure for 1997–98 is 97,000 and the one for the current year is 130,000. [Interruption.] Those figures are in the Department's own report. I do not know where the Department got the numbers from if they did not exist.

As the hon. Member for Havant observed, one thing that was mentioned only briefly in the Budget statement—we should probably be grateful that it was mentioned at all—was the Government's U-turn in deciding that paying the working families tax credit through the pay packet was a mistake. One of the first Bills whose progress through the House I followed was the one that introduced that credit in 1998 or thereabouts. The only difference between working families tax credit and family credit is payment through the pay packet. When we opposed that, we were patted on the head and told that we did not understand that people needed to learn a lesson. As the hon. Member for Havant says, that is a metaphysical argument. It was suggested that people were capable of understanding that work pays only if the money was in their pay packets. First child tax credit was taken out of the pay packet because the Government accepted our argument that mothers were the best recipients of benefit for their children. Then the Government finally accepted the "burden on business" argument that leaving the fag-end of tax credit in the pay packet—often £6 or £7 a week—was simply not worth it.

Business, families and parents would have been saved an awful lot of hassle if the Government had only listened to the Liberal Democrats in the first place—I am glad to see the hon. Member for Havant nodding at that—and to others who supported us.

The working families tax credit has been changed, but the child tax credit has received almost no attention. It was frozen in the Budget—the amounts for families and the thresholds were frozen. Will it be one of those things that is nibbled away every year so that families on middle incomes do not necessarily spot what is going on but realise, as time goes by, that their support is being eroded? Perhaps the Chief Secretary will tell us whether that is a deliberate policy. Is it the Government's policy to freeze the family element and thresholds indefinitely so that the tax credit is more heavily concentrated on families on lower incomes? That would not necessarily be a bad policy; it could provide a fairer structure. However, the Government should be open and up front about it rather than simply forgetting to index the credit each year.

At the end of the financial year, our constituents will discover, if they have not done so already, that their family finances are on a rollercoaster. The Government will examine people's child tax credit assessment for 2003–04 and try to validate it. They will ask for income information in the following six months and check whether the amount paid in 2003–04 was right. Many people's circumstances will have changed since they filled in the form in January 2003, on the basis of their 2001–02 income. Many people will get a letter or a knock at the door and be told that they were paid the wrong amount in 2003–04, that the amount that they had started to receive in 2004–05 was also wrong, because the figure continued at the same rate as for 2003–04 and that the overpayment for 2003–04 and the first part of 2004–05 will therefore be recovered. That will be so severe that families will probably face hardship. They can then claim a hardship payment that will reduce the clawback but leave a larger amount to be clawed back at the end of 2004–05. That will be carried over into the award for 2005–06, when circumstances will have changed and the fiasco will continue.

Incomes will go up and down, as if on a rollercoaster, and people will never have certainty. They will never know whether what they currently receive is theirs to spend without someone trying to claw it back. Assessment over a year means that every change of circumstances has the potential to affect the award. Both partners' incomes, the number of children, whether partners stay together or get different jobs, and suchlike changes must be documented and perhaps reported because they might affect the award. Has not bureaucracy gone too far? Is not it time to go back to fixed awards—possibly with some flexibility for extreme changes of circumstances—which would save massively on bureaucracy and have the great beauty of ensuring that our constituents knew where they stood? At the moment, they do not. I hope that the Chancellor and the Government will consider that.

In his introductory remarks last week, my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) mentioned imbalances in the economy, referring to personal debt and credit. He calculated that the personal sector owes a trillion pounds and that that equals the combined external debt of Africa, Asia and Latin America put together. That suggests the scale of the debt mountain, but we heard precious little from the Chancellor about tackling personal debt.

Let me give one example that has arisen today. My researcher approached me for a pay rise—a common experience for me. She had received a letter from Barclays bank—her bank—offering her a pre-approved loan of £20,700. The bank suggested that she might spend it on a holiday or a car. I grant that she has expensive tastes, but that would pay for a pretty nice holiday or car. Her bank, which knows how much she earns, pre-approved the loan. The monthly repayments would be £934. I shall not say what percentage of her take-home pay that is, but it is more than half.

Those who want to save money are confronted by bureaucracy. I recently wanted to put some money into a cash individual savings account. I had not contributed any money for a year and I had to fill in all sorts of forms to justify being allowed to save in that ISA. However, anyone who wants to borrow money simply waits until an offer lands on the doormat.

Mr. Salmond: I accept that the subject is serious, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not leave us hanging: did she get the pay rise?

Mr. Webb: We are still in negotiation.

The example highlights the absurdity of the position. Although I only employ staff who are discerning about financial matters, and my researcher will obviously reject the loan, the ready availability of such loans underlines the problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham suggested a 10-point plan for tackling personal debt. I shall not go through it in detail—hon. Members have already heard it—but I emphasise a few simple suggestions. Every year, the Government publish an assessment of the sustainability of Government debt. What about the sustainability of personal debt? Should not the debt bubble form part of the annual assessment? My hon. Friend suggested a curb on the tidal wave of unsolicited credit promotion and attaching some sort of credit health warning to offers such as that which I have described. That is a pretty good idea. He suggests that we should stop penalties for people who pay back their debts early. People who currently pay their debts early can effectively be fined for doing so.

The Budget should have dealt with such issues, which affect the long-term structure of the economy, but it did not. The Chancellor produced a rabbit from a hat instead of serious reform of local taxation. There was no action on the unfairness of the tax system overall, and a failure to tackle the fundamental imbalances of the economy. Liberal Democrats were, to say the least, disappointed with the Budget.

2.15 pm

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): I was unfortunately absent for the Chancellor's statement because I was in south-east Asia with the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. We all know that organising such events takes time and their dates tend to be set in concrete, so it is difficult to avoid missing occasions such as the Budget statement. From reading the debates and anticipating what would happen, it is fair to say that the Government got the expected response from those who support us, and expressions of frustration from those who oppose us because the Chancellor delivered so much of what he promised.

It is interesting to go abroad and talk to people about one's country's economy when the annual health check or MOT that constitutes the Budget is published. We visited Malaysia, Thailand and Singapore—the tiger economies, the sharpness of whose claws has been honed and which are now back in business in a big way. It was interesting to note that their agendas are similar to ours in several respects. They attempt to control public spending and use the money as wisely and effectively as possible. They spend money on knowledge-based industries and are committed to science. In this country, that is evidenced by the commendable agreement that the Chancellor reached with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Such prudent spending of public money depends on its effectiveness being measured. It depends on a test of productivity. Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that that is singularly lacking in the Chancellor's analysis? The Chancellor made many statements about input but few about output. Surely it is productivity that really counts—bang for the bucks, one might say.

Mr. O'Neill: One of the problems that the Government experienced was that, at least for the first two years, they did not spend nearly as much as we would have liked because they set themselves the priority of getting public finances under control. Since then, we have begun to spend more money. As has already been said, the performance and outputs in, for example, the health service are beginning to show consequent improvements. There have been considerable advances in primary education but the secondary sector and some aspects of higher education have yet to experience them. The jury is still out on several aspects of public expenditure and we have to work at greater efficiency. No Labour Member would deny that that was one of our priorities. Indeed, 10 years ago, when John Smith died and we were assessing his career, we remembered that one of the points that he repeatedly made was that economic efficiency and social justice must go hand in hand. They are two sides of the one coin, he said. Creating wealth in order that we can spend it on desirable and necessary social improvements is only part of it. The other part is ensuring, as we are doing, that we invest heavily over the next decade in science, science education and the application of science. That is the only way in which we can make the quantum leap from the kind of economy that we have now to the kind that we need to sustain ourselves.

I find no echo of that among Conservative Members. There is not much in the shadow Chancellor's controlled spending plans to encourage knowledge-based industries or to achieve improvements in areas that require substantial advances if we are to ensure that the economic growth that we have already achieved is sustained.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that economic success is the prerequisite of delivering social justice. A prosperous society can invest in improving the lot of all its people, but I hope that he is not suggesting that social justice, for which I share his enthusiasm, needs to be measured in economic terms. Social justice is about delivering far nobler objectives.

Mr. O'Neill: A number of my constituents are happy when social justice includes a bit of economic assistance and advance. When we had 20 per cent. unemployment in my constituency, it was a far less happy place than now, when unemployment is between 4 and 5 per cent. Labour Members argue that we cannot have economic efficiency unless we have a socially just society in which the divisions and difficulties are diminished. It is perhaps part of the fragility of some of the Asian economies that insufficient attention has been given to the move towards a more socially just society. It is clear that they are making tremendous advances in areas such as the development of the biotech industry, in respect of which we are in as good a position as any other country apart from the United States, and in a better position than most. That applies in a number of IT sectors as well, but we need more of that.

Equally, we need to ensure that, when we spend money on training, it does not merely get people into apprenticeships. One thing that Professor Porter identified in his studies is the need to look at the fact that, once people have tradesmen's qualifications and have completed the apprenticeships, there needs to be subsequent improvement in those skills across the work force. That is not happening. We are getting people out of university into what remains of manufacturing but we are not getting sufficient numbers of people trained beyond the basic requirements to do the job. If we are going to have the kind of investment that we want in new equipment and machinery, we have to have skilled, trained people who are capable of using it.

That is one of the areas to which the Government will have to give more attention. We are making the necessary start and improving the position but we have to go further. We have continually and constantly to replenish the capabilities of the work force to meet the new challenges. It is through that that we will get quality improvements, and that is as applicable in the public services as in the private sector. If we are going to put new equipment, new scanners and new forms of clinical working into hospitals, we have to ensure that there are people there who are capable of utilising that equipment. If we are going to put computer systems into the Department for Work and Pensions, we have to ensure that they are the right ones and that people use them.

If one thing is evident, it is that across the United States and indeed in some parts of Britain, the introduction of computerisation to clerical working has resulted in massive increases in productivity. Indeed, it could be argued that the improvement in the American economy is in no small way due to the introduction of sophisticated IT systems. Not all of them work first time but they work eventually and, when they do, they make fantastic improvements, which can be seen not just in the output per worker but in the reduction in the need for many workers.

An incredible amount of worthwhile, important work is undertaken by low-paid civil servants. None the less, it is drudgery. It would be better if we could get them out of that drudgery into jobs that could better utilise their capabilities. I have no great problem with the reduction in the numbers of people that we are seeking in areas of the civil service. However, I want to ensure that that is done sensibly. I take the point that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) made about the need for proper systems, so that arrangements are in place and people can leave in a decent and orderly fashion. I am confident that, in most instances, those people will be able to secure employment elsewhere. The shift of resources from the public to the private will create the kind of job opportunities that those people will be able to pick up. However, I am a wee bit worried when I hear the old story that it will be all right, turnover will take care of it and there will be no compulsory redundancies. There is always a downside to no compulsory redundancies: we find that there are square pegs in round holes and that they are there merely because they are there.

Often, one finds that, when people hear that their jobs are going to go, the ambitious and effective ones leave and others hang on until the last minute because, perhaps correctly, they anticipate being able to secure reasonable redundancy arrangements, although I cannot imagine that the civil service redundancy arrangements will be particularly generous. I would like to think that they will be better than the state minimum but I am not sure that they will be much in excess of that.

There is no easy way of reducing staffing, but there is a danger in believing that if we do not make it compulsory it will be all right. We have seen in too many areas that the wrong people stay and sometimes the better people leave early. There is a danger there, but Ministers have raised the issue openly and transparently. Let us face it—there is a long way to go before the figures are achieved. I am happy that, with good will, we can deal with that issue. At the same time, the civil servants who perhaps need less attention paid to them than they have received already are those in Customs and Excise who have been suggesting the strip stamp scheme.

I represent a constituency in which, sadly, whisky is no longer produced. For many years, we distilled grain whisky there, which hon. Members will know is the rather less sexy constituent of a blend. It is actually not that potable without malt alongside it. I have had it and it is not the best alcoholic experience I have ever had. I think that one can say that grain whisky involved more of a chemical process. It is like vodka and other such drinks. One can produce it pretty easily in what is akin to a chemical plant.

In my area, we no longer distil but we produce virtually 60 per cent. of all the bottles into which the Scotch goes. About 65 per cent. of the whisky in cask storage in Scotland is in my constituency, so I have more than a passing interest in the matter. I also have the Diageo laboratories and a number of fascinating attendant parts of the whisky process. They depend on a healthy Scotch whisky industry, as do many workers across Scotland. At present, I am not convinced that the rejection of the Scotch Whisky Association's proposals is necessarily the best way of dealing with the leakage of duty from the warehouses. That is a serious problem: it is as if people were opening the bottles and pouring the whisky away, although they are not doing that but selling the bottles in dodgy places. There must be far greater security. The proposals put forward by the Scotch Whisky Association identified that issue and sought to deal with it by trying to create a more secure system for the warehousing of bottles.

Although the whisky industry is dominated by big players, it is also quite fragmented. Many bottling operations are conducted by firms that might not at the moment have the security facilities in place for the storing of strips, or that are perhaps not equipped to have the strips put on the bottles in the first place. I know that it has been suggested that money will be available, and one can only hope that it will be sufficient to fund the scheme, but I have my doubts. I do not think that there will be the backing that is needed.

What disturbs me is that the Chancellor, quite reasonably, issued a challenge to the industry in the autumn statement. The industry has come up with a scheme that has intrinsic attractions: it could be implemented relatively quickly, savings could be made quickly and it could be tested even before the Government's scheme is in place. It would have been more sensible for the Government to accept the Scotch Whisky Association's offer, to scrutinise its proposal and to screw it down. Even if they had made it as damn difficult as possible for that proposal to be introduced, they should nevertheless have given it a chance, and perhaps delayed the stamp scheme for another year.

I recognise that there is a problem that must be addressed, but the whisky industry's option should have been considered more seriously than it has been. It was rejected rather more quickly than I should have wished. I am not wedded to the association's proposals, nor do I necessarily think that we must never have strips, but if we do not need them, let us not have them. Another year's delay would have given both sides in this argument the chance to address the issues.

[Mr. O'Neill]

I am disappointed, because a good rapport had been established. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury was instrumental in rejecting the strip scheme in a previous Parliament, so I am sorry that there has been a change in attitude, and particularly sorry that my right hon. Friend has handled the matter as he has. I thought that he handled it previously with considerable tact and diplomacy. He has been listening to people—this is the point with which I started—whose evidence to the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs was, to say the least, of unimpressive quality. I chair a Select Committee, and I know that when a Committee uses the word "unimpressive", it is usually talking about something that is awful with several other adjectives in front of it—although I put it no more strongly than that. My right hon. Friend has been sold a pup if he has accepted some of the evidence put before the Scottish Affairs Committee, and I hope that he will re-examine the issue between now and the introduction of the Finance Bill. I do not think that anyone was impressed by the strength of the arguments that certain people put before the Committee, and I would like to think that, as the reasonable man that he is, he might look at the matter again.

That is a relatively small complaint in the context of what has been—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) has nothing else to complain about in the Budget. That is the truth of the matter, although if he contributes later, I shall read his comments with interest.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP) rose—

Mr. O'Neill: I shall not give way because I have almost finished.

The Budget, which I heard about in headline form when I was out of the country and whose details I read when I returned, is evidence of the tremendous achievements of this Government and particularly of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. With his grit and determination, he has refused to be deflected from his purpose. We know that he can be an awkward so-and-so at times, and he is certainly determined, but he has built up a foundation for the British economy that is envied across the world. It is certainly envied in Europe, and it has been built up on the basis of the shrewdness, grit and courage that we know that he and his colleagues posses.

I hope that next year, we will have the opportunity to have a Budget of a similar order. As I said earlier, it meets the challenges set down by John Smith of social justice and economic efficiency. If we can sustain that effort, we can sustain the unity of our people and our sense of purpose, and move towards the achievement of the knowledge-based economy that will ultimately be the cornerstone of Britain's future economic success.

2.35 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I begin by referring the House to the register of my business interests, which I have placed in the Register of Members' Interests. My interests do not include the Scotch whisky industry, except as a satisfied consumer, and I wish the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) well in looking after the best interests of that great British industry. However, I do not otherwise agree with him, and my judgment on the Budget contrasts rather starkly with his.

The Budget poses one overriding question to the British public and to this House: when will the Chancellor next raise taxation rates, as he will be forced to do if he and his party stay in office? The public and the House should also ask what the impact of the next stage in the raising of the tax burden and our tax rates would be on this country's medium and longer-term performance. Those questions are left open, and the Chancellor deliberately avoided them in his presentation to this House. Not only are we right to press the question of tax; recent opinion polls suggest that the public are realising that that is the big question facing the country after this Budget.

The Chancellor used all kinds of means to try to obfuscate that question, such as crazy attempts to open differences between the parties, suggesting that there would be a tremendous cornucopia of goodies for the public sector if he stayed in office and ruthless and appalling cuts if he did not. Those matters are not the issue at all. The question is how we should now address the problem in public finances, which, above all, is what a Budget should be concerned with. What is the responsible and prudent way of proceeding if we are to keep intact the long period of sustained growth with low inflation? The Chancellor is so proud to preside over the last two thirds of that achievement, although unless he is very careful, he will find that he is presiding over its smouldering embers.

The Chancellor has misrepresented the background. He is actually going in for the toughest spending round that new Labour has ever experienced, and has decided that the extraordinary rate of growth in public spending that we have seen since 2000 is not sustainable, as some of us on this side of the House have been repeatedly pointing out to him for the past few years. He is therefore slowing the rate of growth in public spending to a level that new Labour Ministers have never experienced before. He is, however, exempting health and education from that, largely because, in the case of health, he has already recklessly committed himself to enormous further increases for the period ahead; and, in the case of education, because he read an article, I think in The Independent, that pointed out that he was in danger of reducing the share of gross domestic product spent on education unless he announced something rapidly in the Budget.

In my judgment, the Chancellor is going to find that there is blood all over the carpet in the Departments of Whitehall between now and this summer, when the House will hear his most important decisions about the allocation of priorities among the Departments. There is not a new Labour Minister in office who has any experience of having to restrain the demands of his Department or resist the more left-wing and compelling single-issue lobbies, but that is what many of them will now have to do. I see that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is looking enigmatic, as Chief Secretaries always must at this stage of the operation.

To say that there is no problem on the Labour side but that there is a huge problem on ours is to create an artificial divide. The actual difference between us is that the Chancellor claims that it is good enough to reduce the public spending growth rate to about 3.2 per cent. a year in real terms, while my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor suggests that it is desirable to reduce the continued growth in public spending to a somewhat lower figure. Both methods pose certain difficulties.

Mr. Watson: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: In a moment.

If the current Chancellor were still a prudent Chancellor, and if he truly could not slow down the growth in public spending beyond his projection, he should—if he were behaving responsibly—have increased taxes in this Budget. That is what the Finance Minister of a benign dictatorship would do—if he accepted the Chancellor's proposition that it is impossible to slow down the growth in public spending below his proposed envelope. Opposition Front Benchers say that the slowdown must go further, although even doing that will still not prevent public spending from growing. My right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor, should he take office—I wish him well if he does—thereby hopes to avoid the tax increases that would otherwise inevitably be forced upon him by the current Chancellor's legacy.

What is not sustainable is the Chancellor's current position. He says that he can maintain the growth in spending, and simply denies that that poses any tax-raising problems. Let me be fair to him: he seems to believe what he says, and he has acquired from the Prime Minister the technique of firing himself up with—in his case—sincere passion. But I find it surprising that he believes what he says, which is why I say that the true question is: when will he face up to the fact that he is heading firmly on a course that will require further increases in the rate of taxation? I shall now give way to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson), who has been waiting patiently.

Mr. Watson: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, for whose experience I have great admiration, for giving way. The shadow Chancellor said that he will match our spending commitments in respect of health and schools, but he also said:

"I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues that the baseline for spending across all of these departmental budgets will be 0 per cent. growth for the first two years".

Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman interpret that sentence for me, and does he regard that commitment as a real-terms cash freeze?

Mr. Clarke: It is, and as I understand it, an envelope has been proposed that aims at a cash freeze. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) was teased earlier about what such a cash freeze would mean for particular Departments. In my opinion, which is based on some experience of public spending rounds, one has to get below cash in some Departments in order to achieve real-terms growth in others. I do not know how far the current Chief Secretary will be allowed to go in the run-up to an election, but my personal preference—subject to the qualification that I have not seen the documents or heard the arguments advanced by the various Departments—would be to go straight to the Department of Trade and Industry, which is spending vast sums at little benefit to trade and industry. The £2 billion budgets—and rising—of the regional development agencies are of questionable value, and there are other parts of Whitehall that could benefit from a zero-based budget. They should be asked to begin by justifying why we are engaging in public expenditure on this scale in the first place. Instead, for next year we should return to those policies that appear to be achieving in practice a worthwhile and measurable benefit to the general public.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will note that we shall seek his advice on these matters, and that the advice he is giving to the House is music to the ears of some of us.

Mr. Clarke: I look forward to my right hon. Friend and his colleagues having a go at a public spending round, because that will certainly be needed.

The reason why the Chancellor will not answer these questions is obvious. Not surprisingly, the Blair Government are following exactly the same course as the Bush Administration, albeit a few months behind. Both are allowing a somewhat unsustainable period of economic growth to run, with their fingers crossed. The Bush Administration are trusting that they will be re-elected in November, and it is a matter for American politicians, rather than for me, as to how one then begins to sort out the fiscal mess.

In the Chancellor's Budget speech, this Government signalled more clearly than ever before that they hope that the economy will get them to May or June 2005, that they will still be being praised in the terms used by the hon. Member for Ochil, and that they will win the election. They hope then to sort out the mess, but I hope my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset will have the chance to do so, because mess there certainly will be as a result of such irresponsibility.

The Chancellor is very selective in his use of history, in that the only historical comparisons that he ever makes are with the late 1980s. That is his benchmark for everything, and he blames our party interminably for everything in that context. The entire history of economic policy since the war shows that once the public finances start to deteriorate—once we start sliding into debt that appears unsustainable—the longer one delays the necessary remedy, the more powerful the later consequences. That is exactly what this Chancellor is experiencing.

Total disaster has not hit the Chancellor because he got his economic growth forecasts right. I said that he would be lucky if he achieved them, and he has. As the Government keep their fingers crossed and move towards the finish line in June, it is a case of "So far, so good." Growth has held up better than practically every independent expert in the country expected, but it is neither healthy nor sustainable growth. Although we have been doing quite well, such growth is still not as balanced as it ought to be.

Everybody in the House knows that we are sustaining our current level of economic growth because the consumer is still spending heavily. On average, consumers are increasing spending faster than their incomes are rising; indeed, real incomes have declined slightly recently, as a result of the increase in national insurance contributions. Household borrowing is reaching record-breaking levels that are quite unsustainable. As the Bank of England has confirmed, that needs gently to be slowed down.

Economic growth is also being sustained by the amazing increase in public expenditure. That is injecting a deal of growth in the short term, not least because most of it is being spent on increased payrolls and rising levels of public sector pay, which increases some people's consuming power. But one cannot base an economic recovery on that. The private sector in general, and manufacturing in particular, is not doing so well. As the Red Book shows, business investment actually fell by 1 per cent. last year. Our productivity record in the private service sector and the manufacturing sector is deplorable—indeed, it is worse in the public sector—and it certainly is not comparable with that of our chief private sector rivals. That is not a sustainable basis for recovery. Of course, the actual rate of growth will depend on unknown factors in respect of the global economy, which is currently being sustained by a pre-election boom in the United States and a bubble in China. Otherwise, there are some signs of healthy cyclical recovery, but there remains considerable risk.

One measure of this uncertainty was dismissed by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions earlier today. He talked about the current account deficit, but I can remember the days—they were pretty mad days—when the political debate in this country was determined entirely by the balance of payments figures. The newspapers used to be full of them daily, and the Wilson Government fell, I am glad to say, in 1970 because of one month's balance of payments figures, which proved to be not that bad in retrospect—after the electorate had given their judgment. What we used to call our balance of payments—the balance of trade and the current account deficit—is at staggering, record-breaking levels. That matters because it shows how far our consumption is outrunning our capacity to produce, and to meet that consumption. Such a situation is totally unsustainable. It may be "so far, so good" on growth, but we should not rely on that.

The Chancellor left all those matters untouched in his Budget. He delivered his Budget speech with as much élan, self-confidence and robustness as he ever does, but I do not remember him or any other Chancellor delivering a speech with less content in terms of measures. I have never heard a Budget speech with so few tax changes of any significance to announce. The Chancellor filled up the available time, still managing to take up an hour—commendably brief by the standards of most Chancellors of the Exchequer—with a rant saying that he had been right all along and that because he was right on growth, there were no real problems with public expenditure.

In his conclusion, he returned to the political points to kill time, referring to a series of horrendous suggestions that had been made to him. It was not too subtly implied that they had been suggested by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and the Conservative party. None of it was true. The Chancellor said that it was his patriotic duty to reject all those outrageous solutions. In between all that, there was supposed to be a Budget, but long gone are the days when we used to hear about monetary aggregates and be told about tax changes. There were not many of them; they did not fill up much time.

What is important to me is the Chancellor's claim that he had no problems whatever. As I said, whatever party is in office after the next election—this is my key point—it will probably find itself having to deal with a fiscal crisis early in the next Parliament. That is the background that we should all have in the back of our minds, even if it is not in the forefront of our speeches when we seek to get re-elected. The country has had a more than 10-year run of growth with low inflation, but I believe that, unless we are either very lucky or adopt the right measures, it will come to an end in a traditional British fashion.

The Chancellor always boasts about that long run and his only reference to his predecessors is to what happened during the late 1980s and to the interest rates of 1990 before we went into the European monetary system. In fact, I was responsible for about a third of the period: I had four Budgets; the Chancellor has had eight. However, it is extremely reckless of Chancellors to claim credit for any of it. Much depends on what is going on in the world. The only duty of a Chancellor is to provide the stable and predictable circumstances in which other people deliver the wealth and jobs.

Much of the credit should go to Lord Lamont, whose reputation is less high than mine and—sometimes—the Chancellor's, because his introduction of inflation targeting in 1992 started the whole thing off and brought us back to a stable basis of policy: monetary policy based on achieving stable prices and low inflation, and fiscal policy based on achieving healthy public finances. The Chancellor's neglect of the latter is, in my opinion, the cause of our problems today.

Monetary policy worked well since Norman Lamont's inflation target setting, and the Chancellor has slightly improved the target. The Chancellor also reinforced it against all the political pressures from the social democrats around him in the Government by making the Bank of England independent and leaving it to carry on. At the moment, however, the Chancellor is not making the task of the present Governor of the Bank of England very easy, because I am sure that the Governor wants to set limits to how far he will have to put up interest rates, and that fiscal indiscipline will make the problems even worse.

The Chancellor has never had a consistent or sensible approach to fiscal policy—the tax and spending problems that he should tackle. At first he did nothing, saying that he was relying on my figures. As a result of doing nothing, he got carried to a balanced Budget very rapidly—within a couple of years. He overdid it on the spending front and by introducing many stealth taxes, including a shocking one that affected the tax treatment of pension funds. Quite unexpectedly and contrary to forecasts, he then began to run up massive surpluses in the public finances, which he now clings to like a life raft. He is trying to demonstrate that, because he did that in the past, he is entitled to run massive deficits now.

It all changed in the year 2000. Governments are ever-nervous running up towards elections, and the Prime Minister lost his head on the Frost programme, promising health spending up to the levels of European averages. Before we knew where they were, they had become an old tax-and-spend Government with vast outpourings of public expenditure across all Departments, with which we have had to live ever since. The Chancellor forecast how much it would cost and how it could be financed. From 2000–01 onwards, those forecasts have been consistently wrong. That is the problem we have to deal with now.

The Governor of the Bank of England is tackling his part of the problem responsibly, which means that interest rates are already rising—a background worth reflecting on. I know very few people who do not believe that interest rates are going to carry on rising. The more the markets react to what is perceived to be the irresponsibility of the Chancellor, the more the upward pressure on the monetary authorities. The current account deficit in our balance of payments might, if the markets suddenly panic about it, even cause a sharp fall in the value of sterling, which will drive interest rates up further. That much is already happening, but taxes will have to go up after an election as well.

I say to the public that they should reflect on the consequences of that sort of policy. When interest rates are going up because monetary policy is tightening, and when taxes are going up because fiscal policy is tightening, it leads to a severe slowdown in economic activity and growth—and the prospects for growth and jobs are undoubtedly damaged.

The Chancellor says that all that is wrong: he will not break his rules, because he is still a man of fiscal discipline with the golden rule and the debt rule, so all is well. I do not believe that. He produces yet more forecasts, but they have been wrong year in, year out. His forecasts for borrowing are £10 billion more than they were 12 months ago. In 2001, he was predicting that total borrowing between 2001 and 2006 would be £30 billion; but it now seems likely to be close to £150 billion. Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have rightly suggested that his forecasts for further in the future are unreliable.

In fact, the Chancellor is already rejecting some of the discipline rules and saying that they do not matter. He entirely rejects my rule—he regards me as a fiscal conservative—of maintaining a balanced budget over the cycle. I accept that there are wobbly bits even to that rule; it is possible to move the cycle a bit, but I opted for a balanced budget over the cycle that is tougher than the present Chancellor's rule. He says that terrible things would happen if we did that, and that only wicked people like the International Monetary Fund recommend that approach to fiscal policy.

The Chancellor also rejects the Maastricht criteria. I am not going to debate the single currency—I shall avoid it like the plague—but I will use the Maastricht criteria as an example, because the Chancellor and I used to be in fond agreement on them. I used to defend the growth and stability pact as a Tory, even to my Eurosceptic friends, saying, leaving aside the single currency, no responsible Chancellor in the UK is going to want a deficit of more than 3 per cent. of gross domestic product in any one year. This Chancellor used to agree with me; he used to point out how he was complying with all that. Now, it is all wrong, but the only reason it is wrong is that the British Chancellor, in common with the French and German Finance Ministers, lacks the political clout, will and ability to hit the fiscal objectives to the rules.

The Chancellor relies on his own golden rule and he is apparently going to visit the continent to explain why it is the best approach to which all should move. His golden rule is not a golden rule, in my opinion, but merely gilded with a touch of EPNS about it. It all depends on what is defined as investment and it assumes that all public investment is essential and of high value so that future generations of taxpayers should be happy to pay for it. I regard public investment, unfortunately, as invariably less efficient—sometimes very much less efficient and valuable—than other forms. In any case, the Chancellor is now close to the golden rule. As many have pointed out, he has had slightly to redefine how the golden rule is calculated, to provide himself with a further tiny cushion.

I have the Red Book with me, so let me sum up how the Chancellor can claim that he can still hit the golden rule without tax increases. It is by making more implausible forecasts. The most implausible forecast is the Chancellor's estimate of revenue growth. His estimate of GDP growth as a whole remains as optimistic as ever, but he was right this year and might be right again. We shall see whether the global economy will continue to revive, but the forecast has to be right for the Chancellor to have any chance at all.

The revenue growth forecasts are quite implausible, however. I do not understand how corporation tax revenues are meant to rise faster than the growth of the economy as a whole. I do not think that that has ever happened. When briefing the newspapers about income tax returns, the Chancellor's unfortunate officials seem to have been reduced to pointing to recent City bonuses. The suggestion has been that they reinforce the notion that income tax returns are about to recover very rapidly. Because the Chancellor has had to deny that there will be any increase in tax rates, he has claimed that measures to tackle tax avoidance will produce £925 million a year. I do not believe that. In recent years, the thinking has been that a structural problem affected what Governments received from corporation tax and income tax. I therefore do not think that the Chancellor's proposals are at all plausible, or that he will hit his golden rule. I think that he is being irresponsible, and that he should raise taxes.

Not only is the Chancellor failing to control public spending, he will not even admit that the slowdown for which he is heading will have any effect on the Government's plans. He has suddenly discovered that it is necessary to try to make public spending more efficient. He chose to win headlines by saying that he would cut more than 50,000 civil service jobs, 40,000 of them in the Department for Work and Pensions. Sacking bureaucrats is supposed to ensure that more money goes to front-line services. I regard that as extremely lightweight and ridiculous politics.

We have a serious problem with the productivity and value for money achieved by the huge surge in public spending since 2000. Opposition Members warned the Chancellor that sudden and massive public spending increases would not produce value for money. To get proper value from public spending, reform is essential. The reform that has been applied, belatedly, has been confined to matters such as foundation hospitals and top-up fees. Those policies have been so messed about by political campaigning that they are valueless, or worse.

The 40,000 civil servants are symbolic victims. By the most generous calculation, those staff reductions will save about £2 billion a year. The Chancellor assumes that he will save about £20 billion, and is silent about where the balance will come from. I would tell the civil servants not to fear: as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset has said, we have heard the same thing many times before.

The Government do not have many targets these days. When the time comes to see whether any target was ever achieved, no one will remember. In three or four years' time, I have no doubt that some Minister will ask, "Did the 40,000 jobs go?" Sir Humphrey will say, "Oh, yes, Minister. The 40,000 jobs went." The Minister will then ask, "So why are there still so many people in the building?" The answer will be, "Minister, 38,000 of them have been moved to new tasks and new Government initiatives. They are no longer administrators, they are now deliverers."

At any rate, the people will still be there. That is not how to achieve the value for money in public expenditure that we need. Productivity in the public sector is difficult to measure, but it has been falling like a stone in recent years. The money that has been put in has gone largely on increased pay rates and on hugely increased payrolls. There are 500,000 more state employees than there were in 1997, yet many public servants have reduced work loads and the best job security and pension schemes in the country. In those circumstances, it is very difficult to drive up productivity.

We must reform the delivery of health care, education, social care and welfare benefits. In that way, productivity improvements can be achieved, but the Government's record in that respect is woeful.

Although I have celebrated the fact that there was no time limit on speeches on this final day of the Budget debate, I now come to my conclusion. Overall, the Chancellor's target that the state should take 42 per cent. of gross domestic product is too high. It is not healthy for the long-term good of the economy, even if the Chancellor were to succeed in stabilising the proportion taken at that level. The Opposition target is 40 per cent. of GDP, and that is undoubtedly the maximum that can be afforded over the next two or three years. I think that even that is a bit on the high side, but I am a little old fashioned. My target was 35 per cent. of GDP, and I managed to get the level down to 38 per cent.

When he was prudent, the present Chancellor took the level down to 37 per cent. He now tells us that the level can be 42 per cent., and that that is still prudent. What is actually happening is that the state is getting bigger and is consuming more wealth, while the private sector is getting smaller, as a proportion of the whole. Yet the private sector is what creates wealth, and it will be damaged by the Chancellor's policies.

The Chancellor should have tackled some other long-term problems. He said nothing on savings, and that is a disgrace. Pensions will benefit from the simplification of the tax system, but nothing is being done to tackle the pensions crisis that all hon. Members know exists.

Our problems in the housing market stem from more than merely supply and demand: they have arisen because the British have gone back to believing that their houses are the only form of savings that they trust. People buy houses and borrow money on them for financial reasons, not just to meet accommodation needs. They think that their pensions will be worthless, they do not trust insurance companies and they do not want to go to the stock market. They have had enough of fund managers, and their individual savings accounts are losing their tax advantages. As a result, people have piled into property in a dangerous way.

Something must be done to boost other forms of saving. In an earlier exchange, the Minister claimed that the savings ratio was lower in 1988 than it is now. That is true, and it was one of the many problems that we faced in that disastrous year. Since the Government came to power, the savings ratio has halved. It was at 10 per cent. when the Chancellor took over in 1997, and it is a disgrace that the Budget contained no proposals on savings that would have addressed that problem.

The first duty of any Chancellor of the Exchequer is to provide the stable economic conditions in which entrepreneurs, managers and those who work in business and commerce at every level can create wealth for the nation. This Chancellor is failing in that duty. In my opinion, the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset are the minimum necessary to get us back on course and to return the economy to growth. The Chancellor has shot none of my right hon. Friend's foxes, nor those of anyone else.

So far, the Chancellor has been lucky. He had a very good inheritance, and then lived through a period of American boom, when the dotcom nonsense and the concomitant bubble made the world economy grow to a staggering extent. He has got as far as he has by limping along on with his plans for public spending and for borrowing, while relying on a very dangerous bubble in private consumption and debt.

The bubble is coming to an end. If we are not very careful, we will enter a fiscal crisis, and this Chancellor is not being careful at all. I hope that the reckoning at the next election will be his: if he is not removed then, the reckoning will come thereafter, when a more responsible Government will have to sort out the mess that he is very likely to leave.

3.8 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow my namesake, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). He always makes entertaining speeches, and the longer he goes on, the more entertaining he becomes. However, I hope that he will forgive me when I say that I was not persuaded by his Cassandra-like predictions. We have heard them before—in 1997. The British people heard them too, and they made their judgment. I do not want to hurt the right hon. and learned Gentleman's feelings, but they made up their minds about his four Budgets, just as they are doing this week about the Budget that we are debating today. People who expected a counterblast to the Chancellor's Budget speech will be considerably disappointed by what Opposition Members have said.

It is fair to say that the most robust representations on behalf of the Scottish whisky industry were made by my hon. Friends the Members for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) and for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), the latter of whom is the chairman of the all-party Scotch whisky group. I agree with what they said. They accepted, as do I, that the Budget should be judged in context and in perspective, but they sought to encourage Treasury Ministers to listen to the representations that are being made. I shall do the same.

Just before I left for the Chamber, I heard from the Inver House distillery. It is in a neighbouring constituency, but many of my constituents work there. Such a good Budget would be all the better if my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench listened to our views on the Scottish whisky industry. If they did, we could have even greater celebrations than those already taking place on other aspects of the Budget.

When the rhetoric of the past few days of debate in the House is over and people examine what took place, they will conclude—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil—that it was an impressive Budget. Its very impressiveness was one reason why the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe managed to get himself into a lather. Few have really challenged the assertion that the Budget represents success. It is successful not only because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has met his various targets, important though they are, but because of his unshakeable commitment to sustained economic growth—something that numerous Conservative Chancellors failed to achieve over 18 years, to the great cost of my constituents and many others.

The response to the Budget, especially from Opposition Front Benchers, was not a considered criticism of its main thrust. Indeed, we heard Opposition Members taking credit for some of the announcements in the Budget. I had not expected them to be joined by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe, a former Chancellor, in paying tribute to Lord Lamont. In my constituency, we still remember black Wednesday, and we have no desire to return to those days or to the negative equity, high unemployment and high inflation that we experienced under the previous Government but which have not been a feature of this Chancellor's stewardship.

Time after time, Opposition Members have tried to take credit for the Budget's contents. For example, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) complained that he was being interrupted during his paean of praise for the Budget. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) took credit, typically, for the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had the confidence to grant autonomy to the Bank of England, especially on interest rates. However, even those hon. Gentlemen were put in the shade by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), who said in the debate on education that he was "welcoming all the wonderful things that the Government have accepted from Conservative suggestions".—[Official Report, 18 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 466.]

If wonderful things are happening, it cannot be such a bad Budget. That is why I want to be positive about it.

The Budget is about success and real, tangible achievement. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions said earlier, the Chancellor's targets on employment, inflation, interest rates and—most importantly—economic growth are more accurate than those of his critics. They are more accurate than those of economists and financial journalists. To the credit of the latter, they have conceded that that is the case. In the spirit of reality, I remind the House that we are now seeing the benefits of the stability and economic growth to which my right hon. Friend has been committed. Unemployment now costs £3 billion a year less than in 1997. Debt interest payments cost £7 billion a year less. That is £10 billion a year saved, not by market forces or the use of a magic wand, but because the Chancellor set priorities and made sure that he stuck to them rigidly.

Economic growth has enabled the Government to encourage greater investment and the benefits have been felt in many areas, including jobs, training, skills, education, health and transport. I cannot be the only hon. Member who can say that I see the benefits of that investment bearing fruit day after day in my constituency, in a way that did not happen during the 18 years of the previous Government.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions said about apprenticeship courses and skills. In my constituency, the number of people claiming jobseeker's allowance in 1997 was 2,375. Last year, the figure was 1,504—a more than 30 per cent. reduction. That might not matter in debates in the House, but it matters to the young people in my constituency who have found jobs. I welcome the Government's commitment to apprenticeship courses, and the marvellous work of the Department for Work and Pensions in my area. For example, North Lanarkshire council is embarking on the largest ever public investment programme to rebuild and refurbish every school in my constituency. We want apprenticeships that are demand led, so that local employers—small and large—can benefit.

I also welcome what the Department for Work and Pensions is doing for people with disabilities. As my good friend Bert Massie said, on behalf of the Disability Rights Commission,

"I hope that there will be a significant access dividend with increased resources contributing to a reduction in inequalities. But clear targets need to be set. Similarly the new deal for skills needs to be more focussed on closing the qualifications gap between disabled and non-disabled people".

I welcome his views, as will my hon. Friend the Minister for Disabled People, who has dealt so well with disability matters in her Department.

We have our concerns about the private sector, of course, despite the growth in jobs. The Chancellor was right to say that "our belief is that British manufacturing and service industries will rise to the challenge", but there is one specific area of manufacturing where we have been let down. Companies such as Sheffield Forgemasters in my constituency have gone into liquidation, and former employees have no guarantee of receiving their full pension entitlement, even though some of them have worked for the same company for more than 30 years. Despite the Government's new

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

Pensions Bill, which, of course, I very much welcome, I am not alone as a Member of Parliament in calling for more assistance to ensure that people who have worked all their lives and paid into their pension schemes receive their full pension entitlement.

"excellence in education, science and enterprise."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 321–2.]

A very good example of that is the success of the new deal in my constituency. Our share of almost 500,000 young people finding jobs is nearly 2,000 in my constituency. I welcome the announcement last week that, for the first time ever, 16 and 17-year-olds will benefit from the minimum wage. The economic growth that we are seeing has also brought benefits such as pension credit, whereby 3,775 households in my constituency will gain. In all, 4,563 individuals will experience an average award of £41.50, which otherwise was simply not available.

In this Budget, the Chancellor has once again enhanced his reputation for challenging poverty at home and abroad. Having taken 1.5 million children out of poverty in Britain, it was with pride that Labour Members heard him say in his Budget statement:

"I can tell the House that in the spending review this Government will not freeze or cut international development aid, but we will increase it."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 330.]

Whatever criticism might be made of the Government, it is to their eternal credit that they refused to live with the obscenity of 3 million unemployed people. We are now seeing the benefits in the economy, in our social fabric and in the regeneration of our communities, including opportunities for people to work and to exercise their skills. That is why the Chancellor was right to claim that we are nearer full employment than we have been for a generation, and why he was right to reflect, as I hope the House will today, on the words of William Beveridge:

"If full employment is not won and kept, no liberties are secure, for to many they will not seem worthwhile."

3.23 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): After the last two speeches, I now have an embarrassment of riches about which Clarke to agree with. I will probably pursue my normal moderate course in carefully negotiating my way between their two positions. I am struck, however, by the lack of Labour Back-Bench support for the Chancellor's Budget. I recall that, a few years ago, when the right hon. Member for Monklands, East was trying to explain a particular by-election result when the Labour party did very badly and no one turned out, she said that it was sign of contentment with the Government's policies. I dare say that, in the same world of explanation, this vast expanse of empty green Benches is a sign of total contentment with the Chancellor's Budget.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way—I am glad that he, too, is showing such generosity of spirit—but for the record, may I remind him that he is, I believe, referring to my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell)?

Mr. Salmond: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the correction. Of course the constituency has changed—I had not caught up with that—but my point about the right hon. Lady's argument that if no one turns up, it means that hon. Members are content, remains valid. In some ways, that is a dangerous sign for the Chancellor and the Government. I would expect a bit more enthusiasm from Labour Members.

Whatever else we might say about the Budget, the shadow Chancellor's fox has been shot pretty devastatingly, in a Budget that was unremarkable for any great economic measures. It was pretty shrewd politically, in directing some hostile fire at the developing Conservative position. Incidentally, there is an object lesson for the shadow Chancellor: it is probably not the greatest idea in the world to unveil a complete economic plan a few weeks before a Budget. It allows the real Chancellor to make some adjustments to the Budget, making the shadow Chancellor's position look rather foolish. So I suspect that it is back to the drawing board for the shadow Chancellor.

As I said, I want to steer a careful course between the two previous speeches. I do not believe that a Budget deficit of 3.4 per cent. is unsustainable. I agree that it is high—it is, of course, above the Maastricht criteria—and that it is not what the Chancellor said in the past, but when compared internationally or even historically, it is not unsustainable. However, it all depends on whether a number of the Chancellor's forecasts will prove reasonable.

I want to talk about some of the risks and imbalances in those forecasts. I also want to talk about the international environment—and about something that the Chancellor is only now beginning to address after seven years in the job: the regional imbalances in the United Kingdom that represent a major constraint on growth. I also want to talk about the external account, about which I totally share the opinion of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). No one talks about that great subject any more, as if it were of no moment in a world of floating exchange rates, when the chickens do not come home to roost as quickly as they used to. None the less, they will come home to roost, and the fact that the present Chancellor never mentions the external account should be a substantial indication to others that it should be explored and examined very carefully.

Finally I shall turn to what I, unlike the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), believe is a very important subject: tax stamps for whisky. After making some substantive points about his constituency and a crucial industry, the hon. Gentleman said that, given the overall Budget, such a tax was unimportant. On the contrary, it is symptomatic of what is becoming a pattern of behaviour for the Chancellor, who represents a Scottish constituency, towards some of Scotland's great industries, such as oil and whisky. Therefore, I shall speak about that important matter in the Budget debate.

I shall speak first about the international environment. The Chancellor's forecasts depend on optimistic estimates of continuing international growth.

There is a currently a vigorous rebound in the world's economy, but it is subject to uncertainties. The red book anticipates high real growth in the G7 this year—3.75 per cent.—and a doubling of world trade growth to 7 per cent., which would be sustained at the high level of 8 per cent. next year. The UK's own export market growth of 6.25 per cent. this year is forecast to be almost double last year's figure.

Those ambitious forecasts are subject to great uncertainty. We hear daily of the incompetence and deception of the US Administration—including from the revelations of Mr. Richard Clarke, the former terrorism tsar, which explain the extraordinary diversion of international effort to the Iraq campaign over the past year. A little more than a year ago, a united world community focused on a campaign against terrorism. Today, we have a divided world community that is not focused, and a situation that is much more dangerous than previously. The economic impact can be felt in the forecasts.

The deception practised by the United States Administration was aided and abetted by the Prime Minister and supported by members of the Conservative Front-Bench team. Without question, the Foreign Secretary's forecast of almost a year ago that the world would be a safer place after the Iraq campaign has not come to fruition.A Bloomberg report published today says that "The unadjusted confidence index fell to 97.2 per cent. after the Madrid bombings from 101.4 per cent before . . . More indications of slowing growth in Europe may come in a report from Belgium's central bank at 3 pm today. Belgium's business confidence index, regarded by some economists as a leading indicator for Europe, may have dropped to minus 6.5 from minus 5.9".

That may be the immediate impact of the Madrid atrocity, but it indicates that hopes and expectations of vigorous world growth have been overshadowed by the climate of enduring uncertainties that will affect the economy. The Chancellor's hopes of vigorous international growth and of sustained growth in the UK are subject to considerable doubt.

As for imbalances in the UK economy, I must not be too vigorous, because last year for the first time, the Chancellor pointed to an examination of the impact of differential growth throughout the UK—and we can find the outcome in the Budget. That investigation was not mentioned in the Budget speech, but if one looks hard enough in the documents, one finds the statement:

"These geographical economic disparities present a cost to the UK economy both in terms of efficiency and equity."

They do—but there is an absence of any policy measures to tackle the disparities identified. There is no substantial fiscal initiative for the regions of England or the nations of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. There is no attempt at making monetary policy different. There is no great campaign to improve the infrastructure of the English regions or the other nations of the United Kingdom. Most of the major infrastructure projects are in the very area that is too congested—south-east England.

Almost seven years into the Chancellor's tenure, an attempt is being made to undertake a major relocation of public sector, civil service jobs outwith London and the south-east—which strikes me as a belated effort to tackle one of the issues behind imbalances in growth.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman obviously follows regional and national matters closely, so he will recall that in the last Budget the Chancellor placed heavy emphasis on the end of national pay bargaining and the introduction of regional variations in public sector pay as an answer to regional imbalances and recruiting difficulties. The hon. Gentleman may be more up to date, but the Chancellor did not seem to mention that issue this year. Can he enlighten us as to whether that policy is progressing in Scotland?

Mr. Salmond: There is no formal, on-the-surface processing of that policy, although I suspect that it might be included in some of the anticipated savings mentioned by the Chancellor in respect of public sector workers in Scotland and the English regions. We are talking not about London weighting, but about differences in the basic rate for the job. Public sector workers would be wise to pay close attention to the emergence of that plan—not so much in the Chancellor's speeches but in relocation policy. I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for anticipating the next point that I was going to make.

Despite the mention in the Budget documents, and despite the acceptance that there is a problem—even if the Budget is totally devoid of a substantive approach to it—I resent the boastful, broad-brush claim that we have never had it so good for the past 200 years. There have been two technical recessions in Scotland in this Chancellor's term of office. I have to say to the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke)—I have got the constituency name right this time—that to point to an overall growth forecast for the United Kingdom while apparently oblivious to the disappointing relative economic performance in Scotland over the past seven years does not seem to me to fulfil the duty that I would expect of a Scottish Member of Parliament.

Over the past few years, and for the first time in recent memory, a major earnings gap has opened between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. In 1984 there was no difference in earnings between Scotland and the UK average. Now the difference stands at £2,000. The latest employment rate in Scotland is 74 per cent., which is substantially—almost a full percentage point—below the UK average. The unemployment rate in Scotland, which only a few years ago was in parity with that in the rest of the UK, is 5.7 per cent. compared with a UK average of 4.8 per cent. The Registrar General's forecast is for a decline of 10 per cent. in the Scottish population over the next 40 years, but the corresponding forecast for the UK is for a rise of 10 per cent. Last week, a health report said that in some areas of Glasgow, male life expectancy is actually less than that in Baghdad.

Against that background, there is no need for further pats on the back in addition to the pats that the Chancellor has already given himself when boasting of the growth record. Members from Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and the English regions should be looking at whether this attitude of "We've never had it so good in 200 years" is reflected in their constituencies. They should look at the lack of substantive measures from the Treasury team to tackle the major imbalance that is costing us all so much.

My third point is about the imbalances on the external account. When the Secretary of State introduced the debate, he waved this issue away; he was not going to mention it at all. When it was pointed out to him that we were running a deficit of £35 billion or £36 billion in trade in goods and services, he said that that would all be subject to improvements that were on the way as a result of the Chancellor's wise policies. However, the forecast for this year is a deficit of £35.75 billion, and next year will be the same. In 2006, the Red Book forecast increases to a £36.25 billion deficit in the balance of trade in goods and services.

I saw the Chancellor frenetically whispering to the Secretary of State, as he tends to do. He usually does it to the Prime Minister, but he was whispering to the Secretary of State as we spoke about Scotland and deficits. Let me quote the Red Book:

"The BCC survey for the final quarter of 2003 showed that every region except Yorkshire and Humberside recorded growth in export sales, with Scotland recording the strongest balance."

Even with the strong balance in Scotland and the continuing recovery of export sales from Scotland anticipated, the overall forecast is for an enduring deficit in the balance of trade in goods and services.

The historical performance of the UK economy was that normally in times of economic slowdown, the balance of trade in goods and services went into surplus. This time we went through a slowdown and it remained in deficit. If the Chancellor is correct in his forecast of continuing buoyant growth, we cannot expect the improvement that he is looking for. Indeed, despite what the Secretary of State said, that improvement is not even forecast in the Red Book documents.

These issues are important. They are a sign of a fundamental imbalance in the economy and of bills that sooner, rather than later, will have to be accounted for. It would be somewhat more honest and mature of the Treasury team if it addressed in detail the expected results of the great plans to address the fundamental imbalance in the external account.

Finally, I turn to the important issue of tax stamps for whisky. The Treasury team should reflect on the fact that the hon. Member for Ochil is a loyal Government Back Bencher—far too loyal, in my view. The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston is an informed speaker for whom I have enormous respect on a range of issues. They are not natural rebels, so if they choose to criticise the Government—even if they couch that within overall praise for the Budget—their points should be listened to in detail. The all-party view of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs should also be listened to, because it thought that the Customs and Excise evidence in favour of tax stamps on whisky was fundamentally flawed.

There is an example of the Chancellor ignoring Scottish opinion on a major taxation issue affecting Scotland. Two years ago, the Finance Bill proposed a 10 per cent. increase in corporation tax on North sea companies. Warnings were given on an all-party basis that the measure might have a damaging effect on exploration and appraisal in the North sea. Two years later, the damaging effect has come to pass, and despite last year's welcome relief on certain aspects of the taxation and further relief this year, we are still faced with the fact that exploration and appraisal drilling in the North sea is at basement levels. That is despite the ironic fact that oil prices are high, as is the success rate from what little drilling goes on, which is exemplified by a further discovery this morning by Oilexco of a new field—the Brenda field—in the Moray firth, consisting of 150 million barrels or more. Although we should have a boom environment, the Chancellor has created a bust through the ill thought out tax measure that he introduced two years ago. He was warned against introducing it, but he chose to ignore the warning signs.

Angus Robertson: My hon. Friend will be aware that more than 50 per cent. of all Scotland's distilleries are in my constituency, and that many thousands of jobs in Moray depend on the success of the whisky industry. Is he aware that people from leading companies—small, medium and large—have already been to see me since the announcement? They say that the measure will have an impact on jobs and the competitiveness of their businesses. They do not understand why a Chancellor who represents a Scottish constituency would not even listen to the advice of the Labour Chair of the Scottish Affairs Committee on the Friday before the Budget when she said that bringing in the stamps would be "hasty and unwise". Does my hon. Friend agree that the Chancellor has indeed acted hastily and unwisely?

Mr. Salmond: Yes, and I know from speaking to the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) that she would have added a few more adjectives before the words that my hon. Friend mentioned.

The Treasury team should take on board the analogy that I am making with the oil industry. Having spoken to Ministers, I think that they would have approached the tax changes two years ago in a different way if they had their time again. The tax changes affecting oil and gas could have been introduced in a way that would not have damaged exploration and appraisal drilling yet would still have secured the Government the additional revenue that they wanted. They chose to ignore advice, and the consequence of that has been lost jobs, lost opportunities, and unnecessarily lost investment in the oil and gas industry.

We are in exactly the same position now. The unions, the companies and the whisky industry have put forward an alternative proposal, but it cannot have been subject to serious consideration, because it was made only recently. The evidence from Customs and Excise has been shot to pieces in front of a Select Committee of the House, and members of the Scottish Affairs Committee from every single party agree about deficiencies in the evidence presented. In those circumstances, why not take the wise advice, consider the matter again and at least try out the industry and union proposals before going on to introduce a measure that might damage investment and jobs in, and prospects for, another of Scotland's great industries, as happened with the oil and gas industry?

As I said at the outset, there seems to be a pattern of behaviour. During the Chancellor's term in office, the oil industry has been responsible for some £30 billion of Government revenue. As we know, the whisky industry is a huge earner for the Government, and the revenue from it runs to many billions of pounds a year. Is the Chancellor trying to demonstrate—as he hopes for higher office in the years to come—that he will not be thirlled to his Scottish background nor show an unwanted pro-Scottish bias? If that is the case, I give a message to the Chancellor of the Exchequer: we accept that although he represents a Scottish constituency, the measures that he is introducing show no signs of Scottish bias. Relieved of that burden, perhaps the Treasury team will look again at the prospects for that major industry in Scotland and not inflict unnecessary damage on an industry that contributes so much to our economy and, like the oil industry, bankrolls the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury team.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). I may not always agree with him, but he is a noteworthy parliamentarian, and we always enjoy his speeches very much indeed.

A number of Budget announcements have a deep resonance with the Public Accounts Committee, which I have the honour of chairing. I want to highlight the relevance of our work in driving through the efficiency improvements that the Chancellor expects and that, indeed, the British people deserve. I also want to sound a warning note about the ability of Departments to achieve their objectives in making large planned increases in public expenditure. I shall say a few words about the Comptroller and Auditor General's work in auditing the Budget assumptions, and finally, I shall address ways in which we can promote private sector involvement and solutions for Government efficiency and economy.

The PAC is not political, but is concerned about achieving value for the taxpayer. It does not matter whether its members are Labour, Liberal or Conservative—in theory, at least, they should hate and detest waste. We have an important role to play in encouraging efficiency across Government. Most people, including the taxpayer and the man in street—the people who matter—agree that we are not getting full value for money at the moment. I would argue that rapid increases in spending in any country in any historical era always result in less economy and efficiency. A recent report by the independent National Audit Office, which does not have a political axe to grind, stated that there is a risk that if more money is put into public services, it will simply be wasted. Given that, we are told, there are fewer qualified nurses in the NHS than there are support staff and managers, that is a definite and worrying possibility.

Angus Robertson: The hon. Gentleman will certainly have seen the NAO report on Customs and Excise warnings about fraud on spirits. Will he confirm that it concluded that Customs and Excise statistics were unreliable and that it would not be right to introduce expensive and fraud-prone strip stamps on that basis?

Mr. Leigh: The NAO is careful not to come to any conclusion about whether a new tax is right or not, as that is a policy matter. However, it found that although the Customs and Excise assumptions were made in good faith, as were those of the Scotch Whisky Association, there was an enormous difference, ranging from £10 million to £1 billion. The hon. Gentleman is therefore right that the jury is out, and it is for the Government to make a policy decision.

Central Government administration costs have already increased from £14 billion to £21 billion in the past six years. It is not surprising that the NAO says that just a 1 per cent. improvement in the way in which money already voted by Parliament is spent over the next three years would give us £14.5 billion more for essential public services, which is why the battleground of politics is now how we can reduce waste, incompetence and inefficiency in the public services. The Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office have together published a wide range of reports making recommendations to secure greater efficiency, well over 90 per cent. of which have been accepted by the Government. It is true that improvements have been made following our recommendation, but there is still far more to be done. I could spend the next 10 minutes detailing examples of waste, incompetence and inefficiency in Government Departments.

Waste in government is legion. I shall give one or two well known examples. Forty brand-new Apache helicopters, worth more than £1.2 billion, are waiting around on Salisbury plain unused, costing the taxpayer £6 million, because the Ministry of Defence did not train enough new pilots. The Libra project—the national IT project for magistrates courts handled by the former Lord Chancellor's Department—has in four years more than doubled in cost to almost £400 million. The project management was a catalogue of disasters and, needless to say, the magistrates courts still do not have the IT system that they deserve. That is unacceptable.

We have heard a great deal about the Department for Work and Pensions, one of the worst offenders. No one has yet mentioned, though, that just one computer project—a failed project: the benefits payment card—cost more than £1 billion. The new Child Support Agency computer does not work properly. Unbelievably, the Department for Work and Pensions loses between £3 billion and £7 billion every year in fraud and error. Neither the Department nor the Committee has any idea whether the sum is £3 billion or £7 billion. The accounts have had to be qualified every year for the past 13 years.

Let us consider a future project: the plans for a new supreme court. How much will that cost the man in the street? Lord Woolf says it will cost about £50 million, which is already a great increase on the Government's estimate. I make one prediction—that the costs of the new supreme court, like the costs of the Scottish Parliament, will rise remorselessly.

That is as it may be. We all know that there is waste and incompetence in government, and there always has been. But the Chancellor, we are told, has set the agenda—5 per cent. real-terms cuts in departmental administration costs across the board by 2008—and we wish him well. Sir Peter Gershon is working to identify how new technology, changing working practices and better procurement could free up resources for the front line. We all eagerly await his report, which is due to be published in June. So far, we have had only leaks and a predictable furious reaction from the public service unions, which have spoken of it as a cut-and-paste job. One can dismiss that reaction as typical and obvious, but it does not say much for the ease with which the cuts can be carried out.

My Committee, supported by the NAO, has already identified many specific areas in which savings can be made, and it will continue to do so. Departments should take that into account in driving through efficiency measures. I shall take a few recent examples. The National Audit Office reported a fortnight ago on the work of the Office of Government Commerce to improve procurement in Whitehall. I am pleased to say that the OGC has had a beneficial impact. Since March 2003, savings have totalled £1.6 billion, well over the target of £1 billion set for that period. Indeed, the ease with which the target was exceeded makes one wonder whether the target was too easy.

Among other things, the OGC's guidance and advice has led to an increased emphasis on professional procurement skills and the development of framework agreements for purchasing goods and services. I will say one thing about Sir Peter Gershon, whom I have got to know reasonably well over the past two or three years: he is an object lesson in the new type of public servant that we need—someone brought in from the private sector who is willing and prepared to get a grip on a difficult problem. But much more can be done. The NAO has identified a possible £300 million in savings that could be generated quickly if there were greater take-up by Departments of the OGC's advice. When the PAC considers the subject next month, we will look hard at why some Departments are much better than others at making savings.

Under the Government's plans, the Department for Work and Pensions will be subject to the largest reduction in staff posts, as we know. In order to achieve that without affecting front-line services, it will be necessary to eliminate duplication and inefficiency in all the Department's work. I must sound a warning, however. History tells us that, to achieve such cuts, civil servants will inevitably push some of them on to front-line services. That will happen, as sure as night follows day, whatever the good intentions of Ministers.

Later this week, my Committee will highlight how greater reconsideration of benefits decisions could reduce the number of cases taken to appeal, with consequential administrative savings. That is all good solid work, but it is often on the margins, and we have to get to the root of the problem. For example, savings in one Department can often be achieved elsewhere. The NAO identified more than £3 million that could be saved by reducing the cost of processing application forms for driving licences and attendance allowance. Similar improvements across Departments could save hundreds of millions of pounds.

In his Budget speech, the Chancellor pointed to spending increases across a range of Departments and programmes, including continued and substantial increases in health, education and transport. The NAO recently published a progress report on preparations by those three Departments to spend that extra money. The NAO is, of course, completely independent, but I have always tried to encourage it in this area, which represents a valuable new part of its work.

Our Committee will hold a hearing on these issues in a month's time. Managing resources on this scale requires of Departments highly developed skills, robust systems and comprehensive, reliable information management. As the Committee has pointed out in many previous Administrations, if those are not in place, there is not only a risk but a certainty that waste and inefficiency will follow. I stress, as I did when I questioned the Prime Minister in the Liaison Committee a few weeks ago, that this is not a party political point. We must be confident that the extra money will make its way to front-line services and lead to better performance, and that it will not be consumed by extra bureaucracy or regulation, or by over-targeting, as has clearly happened in the past.

When I put those questions to the Prime Minister, it was interesting to hear him come out with the defence that we have employed so many more nurses, doctors and people in front-line services. We all accept that. Of course, if we spend an extra £61 billion, we are going to get more nurses, doctors and operations. Immediately, however, the Chairman of the Liaison Committee, who is not a member of my party, butted in on the Prime Minister and said, "We're not interested in what you have achieved, Prime Minister. We're interested in what you haven't achieved, given the amount of extra money that you are spending." I believe that that is the key battleground of politics.

Extra resources must be used to bring beneficial changes across the public service. The Chancellor said that 99 per cent. of cancer patients are now seen within two weeks of urgent referral to a specialist. That is excellent news, as early specialised care greatly improves chances of survival. However, not everyone with cancer is benefiting. A recent NAO survey of GPs showed that one third of those eventually diagnosed with cancer were referred "routinely", rather than urgently, and were therefore not seen so quickly.

Improvements in public services must be sustainable. Spending on early education and child care will continue to rise until 2007–08, and there is no doubt that that is leading to real improvements. How could it not, given the huge increases in spending on child care? I warned in February, however, that half the 600,000 additional places created since 1998 had subsequently closed. We have, therefore, created a huge amount of churning with this increased spending. Worse still, the children and families who have the greatest needs and the most to gain still have the worst access. There are too few child care places for children living in the most deprived areas of the UK, and too few services available to children with disabilities.

The Chancellor announced ambitious plans to reduce administration and to cut civil service jobs. He hopes that these proposals, together with other measures, will realise efficiency savings of £20 billion a year. That is his target, and it is very ambitious indeed. I believe that it will require a massive sea change in Whitehall of a kind that we have never seen before, either in wartime or in peacetime. I welcome the cuts, but they must reduce administrative bureaucracy, rather than cutting front-line staff such as doctors, nurses, teachers and policemen.

Cuts in so-called back office administration, which has become a cliché, to which we all sign up, must not lead to poor performance and inadequate capacity in any one part of the delivery chain. The civil service will always have a tendency to make a political point to its political masters by passing on those cuts quickly to front-line services.

I want to draw the attention of the Treasury Bench to the work of my Committee and the NAO on Departments' management of resources and their capacity to spend. I hope that they will ensure that it is read widely in Whitehall. To avoid waste and inefficiency on the huge scale to which, sadly, we have already borne witness, the NAO should be free to conduct detailed and continuous audits of each and every Department. It should register staff numbers and efficiency levels, and the resultant information and recommendations should be freely available in a publication, including a league table format as is the case for local authorities. Departments should be rated for their work, as local authorities are, as poor, good or weak. Permanent secretaries should be held accountable to Parliament, as accounting officers, in the same way that directors are held accountable to shareholders. In the private sector, managers are given performance incentives, bonuses if they do well and the sack if they do badly. That still does not happen in the public sector.

I no longer believe, having been involved in this field for a few years, that mere ministerial instruction, however well intentioned, even with the backing of a huge majority in Parliament, will ever deliver fewer civil servants or a more effective civil service. There must be incentives on senior managers.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): When I was a member of my hon. Friend's august Committee, before he was Chairman, I suggested that the promotion hierarchy for senior civil servants should be dependent on their ability to manage satisfactorily the budgets in their Department. Does my hon. Friend have any sympathy with that idea?

Mr. Leigh: Yes, I have enormous sympathy with that idea. Civil servants should be assessed on how they run projects. We must move away from a culture in the civil service whereby promotion has depended too much on one's ability to advise Ministers and deal with policy, and too little on running projects. Again and again, we see permanent secretaries—senior civil servants—who have never run a project in their lives, and never been assessed on that. That is simply not acceptable in the modern world.

I want to comment briefly on the Comptroller and Auditor General's budget assumption work. Under the Finance Act 1998, the National Audit Office audits those parts of the Budget for which the Chancellor sees fit—that is the important part. This year, one of the assumptions newly audited by the NAO related to the growth of the VAT gap. Mention has already been made of the different estimates on fraud and error used as part of a new method for forecasting VAT receipts, which is a vital part of the Chancellor's arithmetic and of how he informs us that he can keep to his golden rule.

The NAO found that the rate of growth in the VAT gap exceeds the historic average, and is therefore duly cautious. The NAO brings independence to its work and, clearly, expertise—not just financial, economic and statistical expertise but the expertise that comes from being able to do its core audit work across Departments. I use the VAT gap assumption as an example of precisely that. As we have been told, the NAO recently published a report on work by Customs and Excise to tackle VAT fraud and losses. It shows that Customs and Excise is stepping up its efforts against VAT fraudsters, but it is too early to be optimistic about the impact on the VAT gap. The important point, which I have not yet heard emphasised in this debate, is whether it can secure a sustained reduction in fraud and error, which currently run at a staggering £12 billion. The jury is still out on that. On those assumptions alone, we can see what a difference—billions of pounds—can be made in revenues coming into government.

As I said, the National Audit Office audits those parts of the Budget that the Chancellor sees fit for audit. Some assumptions have been audited in the past, others this year. A valid assumption made last year and audited as such will not necessarily be valid this year. The fact that something has been audited in the past does not make it right today or tomorrow.

I believe that we should assert, or rather reassert, the traditional independence of our auditor. He is, after all, our auditor. He reports to us—to Parliament—not to the Government. Surely it is time for the Treasury to consider amending the Finance Act to give the Comptroller and Auditor General the unfettered freedom—I emphasise those words—that he enjoys in all other aspects of his work, so that he rather than the Chancellor decides which assumptions to audit.

I am pleased to see both the shadow Chancellor and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury present. This is not a party political point, and I hope that both sides can agree that if the main parliamentary auditor is asked to audit something, he must have freedom to do the work that he wants to do. I believe that that—coupled with the implementation of my earlier suggestion that the NAO should conduct value-for-money audits of Departments—would produce more confidence, more transparency and more accountability. Surely we as parliamentarians are interested in confidence, transparency and accountability. We should at least be able to agree on the parameters of political debate. We can have an argument across the Chamber about a policy decision on whether to spend more or less on a particular aspect of government, but let us at least agree on the assumptions.

I am very cautious about the ability of any Government—I am thinking of historical examples—to reduce waste and incompetence in the public sector. I have no doubt that each month during the next 140 years—just as happened during the last 140 years—the NAO will produce a coruscating report on waste and incompetence in the public sector. I believe that we must ultimately move towards private sector solutions. I give the Government credit for having grasped the nettle, or bitten the bullet, in terms of the private finance initiative. That met with some opposition on their own Benches, but involving the private sector in the delivery of public sector solutions has enabled us to produce more hospitals and other buildings to budget and on time.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Does my hon. Friend think that we are transferring as much risk from the public to the private sector as was originally intended through the PFI? Or is it too much of an exercise in trying to take finance off the Government's balance sheet?

Mr. Leigh: That is an interesting point. Some of my hon. Friends, in particular, believe that that is what lies behind it, which is worrying. A couple of weeks ago, I had an interesting conversation with the former Chief Secretary in the French Government. Members of that Government are coming to study what we are doing with the PFI. There is amazement throughout Europe that there is so little political debate about the fact that so much debt is being transferred to future generations. There is little understanding of that in Parliament, and we engage in little debate about the whole PFI issue, which I think should be a central element of financial debate. Our debates should be better informed so that we can resolve the issue one way or another.

I believe—it is a purely personal belief—that we shall have to adopt more PFI-type solutions in other areas of public sector work, including the management of hospitals, schools, DWP projects and perhaps entire benefits systems. The debate on all that has hardly begun.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for being so generous in giving way. Part of the purpose of the PFI was to transfer risk, but many companies involved in such schemes tell me that the risk is considerably reduced because their lawyers spend so much time trawling through contracts and including exceptions in them. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government need to become much smarter in their specifications?

Mr. Leigh: Yes. That is a good point on which to end. If we are to move towards more private sector involvement in delivering Government programmes, we must be much cannier, smarter and more ruthless when we deal with the private sector. Private companies take no prisoners. I do not blame them for that because they are there to make a profit. The Public Accounts Committee has witnessed too many examples of the risk not being transferred.

Let us consider only one such example—I could cite numerous others. The Government decided to build an armouries museum in Leeds. Hugely over-optimistic assumptions were made, and it went bottom up. The Government immediately bailed it out. Did the private sector suffer? Of course not. It never suffers in such circumstances. That is why we must bring more private sector people into government so that they work for us.

Let us forget for a moment the normal party political divide and unite as the guardians of the taxpayer. We represent the taxpayers, who pay for everything in this Building, all PFI projects and everything that we do. Why do we allow so many instances of the private sector, which we want as a partner, taking us for a ride because it employs better lawyers and is more ruthless and vigorous in dealing with projects?

There was one recent example in a Committee hearing of a project that the Government delivered well. I believe that it was a new call centre in the NHS. I asked one question of the lady who ran it: "How long have you been in this job?" She replied that she had been running the project for five or six years. That was a unique example of somebody in the public sector who had not been moved from job to job but was there, on the ball, and had run a project for not just a few months or a year or two, but for five or six years. She had the expertise to run it and to deal with the private sector.

That is a good note on which to end. I hope that, at the end of the Budget debate, we can unite in trying to get the best deal for the taxpayer.

4.12 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who gave a persuasive exposition of the way in which it is possible to reduce the rate of increase in spending—he specifically referred to the Department for Work and Pensions—without cutting front-line services. I intend to draw on my experience as a member of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions to speak about poverty and the Budget.

I want to make three preliminary remarks. First, I am determined, in a moderate and irenic spirit of good will, to welcome something in the Budget. I shall therefore join my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) in welcoming the £100 payment to pensioners. I am not sure that my constituents in High Wycombe and Buckinghamshire will be as generous-minded without expressing some reservations. The payment follows the transfer two years ago of some £11 million out of Buckinghamshire to other counties. The preceding year, my constituents paid an increase of more than 15 per cent. in the county council element of the council tax.

Mr. Cameron: I hope that my hon. Friend has read page 256 of the Red Book when studying the Budget. It states that the Chancellor is already planning an increase of 6 per cent.—three times the rate of inflation—in the council tax. For my hon. Friend's constituents in Buckinghamshire, will not the £100 be given with one hand while money is taken away with the other through the increase of 6 per cent. in their council tax bill, which is roughly £1,000? My hon. Friend should be careful to warn his constituents that what the Chancellor giveth, the Chancellor taketh away.

Mr. Goodman: My hon. Friend is right. I am several hundred pages behind him in my perusal of the Red Book.

Mr. Cameron: I skipped.

Mr. Goodman: My hon. Friend says that he skipped, but I was about to make the same point as he did. The 15 per cent. rise that I mentioned was followed by a 5 per cent. increase last year. Those increases have hit pensioners on fixed incomes who receive low annuity payments. That group of people has suffered real cuts in income in the past few years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who looked ahead in the Red Book, said, what the Chancellor gives with one hand, he takes back with the other.

Secondly, I want to make a brief point about Equitable Life.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that it was a mean payment with strings? As I understand it, the £100 payment will be only £100 per household, it will apply to pensioners only when they reach the age of 70 and it is a one-off payment, not an ongoing payment to meet the considerable increases in council tax.

Mr. Goodman: In the light of my hon. Friends' remarks, I am already beginning to regret my generosity to Government Front Benchers. My hon. Friend is, of course, absolutely right.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I have warned my hon. Friend before, and now have reason to do so again, against the tendency towards excessive generosity to those on the Treasury Bench. I hope that he will hold it in check. Does he agree that, in addition to the depredations from which pensioners in Buckinghamshire have long suffered under this Government, there is real grievance at the failure to pay child tax credit to all too many people in our respective constituencies who are entitled to it but have been deprived of it on account of Government incompetence?

Mr. Goodman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to warn me of excessive generosity to the Government. I must in turn warn him that when he says, as he often does, that it is important to combine social justice and economic efficiency, he, like me, must be wary of echoing too much the language used by Government Front Benchers, but the point that he made was right.

Secondly, on the subject of Equitable Life, those on the Treasury Front Bench will not be surprised to hear that many of my constituents have expressed dissatisfaction with the recent statement on that subject by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. That is why I wish to commend on their behalf the early-day motion tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the shadow Chancellor, which calls on the Government

"to find a way in which either the Parliamentary Ombudsman or Lord Penrose himself can now examine possible maladministration by the Government Actuary's Department and other regulatory bodies, in order to make recommendations on compensation."

I hope that those on the Treasury Bench will bear that in mind. I believe that such a move by the Government would have been an admirable feature of the Budget. Sadly, it was not to be.

Thirdly, I want to make some brief remarks about the Budget in relation to health spending. Many of my constituents in Buckinghamshire will be asking where all the money has gone. A consultation paper has been published in relation to children's services at Wycombe hospital and to other services. It is proposed that the children's ward, maternity services and the special baby care unit all be moved to Aylesbury. That is in the context of a £15 million deficit across health bodies in Buckinghamshire.

I realise that all health bodies and other bodies have to live within their budgets but there are some startling figures against which those proposals must be seen. Health spending in Bucks is some £400 a head. In Liverpool, for example, it is some £900 a head. It is legitimate to ask whether the assumption that we truly have a national health service is right because what the Government are effectively saying to my constituents in High Wycombe and Marlow is that, in health terms, they are worth less than half what the people of Liverpool are worth. It is in that context that we must see those plans.

I say to those on the Treasury Bench that, whatever the Chancellor may have said in his Budget statement about health care spending, we face a danger in Bucks. I want to put it no higher than this. It is possible that babies could die because of the extra length of the journey from the middle of High Wycombe, where deprivation is concentrated in the town, to Aylesbury. It is a deeply worrying prospect and I heard nothing in the Budget that will do anything to address that.

I turn to poverty in the light of my work on the Select Committee on Work and Pensions. At the risk of rousing the wrath of my hon. Friends, I point out that I have before in the House paid tribute to the Government's intentions in relation to poverty. I think that they are admirable and that it does no one in the House any good when political parties impugn each other's motives unfairly. I am, however, a little more critical and questioning of the means to be used. We now know that the Government are likely to meet their 2004 child poverty target, which is welcome, but like many of my hon. Friends I am a little dubious about the value of relative poverty measures, because they produce perverse results—a point that was not cleared up in the Budget. If there was a collapse in median incomes, we would have the perverse outcome that we could be said to have solved our poverty problem because incomes at the top had fallen. That is the difficulty with all relative poverty figures, so I have always been dubious about the measure on which the 2004 target is based.

The Government could have answered in the Budget several questions that surround the 2010 target. First, they say consistently that they are committed to eradicating child poverty, but I have never heard Treasury Ministers clearly explain what that noble objective means. Does it mean eradicating absolute poverty, eradicating severe or persistent poverty, or eradicating relative poverty? The latter is surely impossible without complete equality of outcome, a task that even old Labour would have found extremely ambitious.

Secondly, the Chancellor could have cleared up ambiguity in the new measure.

Mr. Webb: I am listening with care to the hon. Gentleman's comments. He says that to eliminate relative poverty we would need absolute equality. However—and this is not just a nit-picking point—the relative poverty line is generally at 60 per cent. of the median, whereas there are Scandinavian societies in which deviation from the median of greater than 40 per cent. is regarded as extreme. That sort of relative poverty is much narrower. Such a modern society is conceivable, even in the west, and does not require absolute equality.

Mr. Goodman: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that relative poverty can be interpreted in several ways, and it could be interpreted as it is in Scandinavia. However, I put it to him that if we spoke to the man or woman in the street, who perhaps does not study the arcana of these matters as he does, about the abolition of relative poverty, they might indeed believe that any Government who sought that were aiming at absolute equality of outcome.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Again, my hon. Friend is being too kind to the Government in relation to child poverty. The number of families with children who are homeless continues to rise substantially and, in particular, the number of families with children living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has almost doubled under the Government. For a family with children to be in such accommodation is a miserable way of living.

Mr. Goodman: I completely agree, and when I have finished my canter through the Government's rather dubious and undefined measures, I intend to come to such points; but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point now.

Mr. Bercow: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is unwise to focus on relative conceptions of poverty. We are all familiar with W. G. Runciman's "Relative Deprivation and Social Justice", which is an interesting thesis but does not, I think, advance the cause. Is it not wiser to focus on absolute poverty and the significant number of people in our country today who still lack the basic essentials, to one of which my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) alluded? It is that phenomenon with which the Government should principally be occupied.

Mr. Goodman: My hon. Friends are putting me to shame: my hon. Friend the Member for Witney is familiar with the Red Book and my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) has read even more widely. He is absolutely right. That was the very point that I was about to make, because in relation to the 2010 target, the Government have replaced their single measure with a triple measure. They intend to measure relative low income, absolute low income and material deprivation and low income combined, and I join him in agreeing that the second and third of those measures are far better than the first. However, my point is that the Government have not made it clear in the Budget whether they will hit their target only if they move in the right direction on all three of those measures at once. The Chief Secretary might be able to tell us something about that later.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): In a way, the hon. Gentleman has shot my fox, as I was about to say that the Government's measurements of poverty involve those three ingredients. The Library paper on child poverty makes it clear that that is the context for the Budget debate. As he might know, the paper begins by quoting a previous Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said that defining poverty was so hard that he was not going to bother. As a result, he certainly did nothing about it.

Mr. Goodman: All Governments are very wary of defining poverty, as our Select Committee discovered when we asked Ministers about this issue. The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to those measurements, and I hope that, like me, he wants to know more about how they will work in respect of the 2010 target.

I had hoped that the Chancellor would say something about housing costs. Previously, the Government have attempted to hit their target on the basis of incomes before and after housing costs. But we now know that, although they will continue to publish the "after housing costs" figure, they tend to make the calculation on a "before housing costs" basis. With due respect to the Government—many of my Labour colleagues on the Select Committee share this view—if one makes the calculation on a "before housing costs" basis in London and the south-east, where such costs are extremely high, one gets an artificially good result. So we need to be sure that the 2010 measurement is fair in that regard.

Neither the Chancellor nor the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has taken the opportunity to say whether Northern Ireland, where child poverty is extraordinarily high, will be included in the figures in 2010. The Government did not have to hand—or so they tell us—the family resources survey information that they needed to include Northern Ireland in the measurements in 2004. But that information is to hand in such a way as to enable them to measure poverty in Northern Ireland, as well as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, for the 2010 target, so perhaps the Minister could make it clear whether the Government intend to do so.

It is important to look very closely at the figures on child poverty, but I hope that the House agrees that, in the end, measuring child poverty and poverty in general is not everything. What we really need to know—such information is not always to hand—is whether the money that the Government have put into reducing child poverty and the rise in the incomes of poorer people, which cannot be dissociated from worldwide economic growth, are actually improving life chances. On the basis of the evidence available, we seem not to know the answer. We cannot be sure that such income increases are boosting health and happiness, improving relationships and parenting, raising educational attainment, breaking the cycle of crime, and improving not just standards of living, but quality of life.

I want to conclude by considering three groups of people whose life chances were not improved by last week's Budget, the first of which is pensioners. The Government must now accept that they have a very deep problem with their pensions policy. From trawling voluntary groups, industry and business, it has become clear that only the Government support an approach that concentrates on means-testing as a way of relieving pensioner poverty. According to the most recent figures that I have seen, someone who draws the state second pension in full will not have enough money to float themselves off means-tested benefits. By 2025 and 2050, a huge proportion of pensioners will be entirely dependent on such benefits. That will damage savings and pensioners consider it an affront to their dignity. I have drawn attention before, in the context of Select Committee reports, to the extremely poor take-up figures. We knew in the days before the minimum income guarantee had been replaced with pension credit, that the non-take-up rate for the MIG was approximately a third. We now know that the non-take-up rate for pension credit is about half. That means that half of our poorest pensioners are gaining nothing whatever from pension credit, and nothing in the Budget or the Pensions Bill will put right the mis-structuring of the Government's pension policy.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is some benefit in targeting money on the less-well-off pensioner? Surely the Conservative policy of re-establishing the link between the basic state pension and earnings would simply give additional funds to every single pensioner in the country, including perhaps Baroness Thatcher and others like her who do not need it. Is it not better to target the money to where it will be most effective?

Mr. Goodman: I am not aghast in horror at the prospect of paying a higher state pension to Baroness Thatcher, but I put it to the hon. Gentleman that, among sections of Labour Back Benchers, our pensions policy is more popular than the Government's. The essential problem with the means-testing policy is the take-up. If the hon. Gentleman's constituency is typical, half the poorest pensioners living in it are not receiving pension credit. For reasons that I have already explained, that is wrong.

The second group who will not benefit from the Budget are people with disabilities who are out of work, and I have some new information to share with the House about them. We are familiar with some of the figures and we know that there are something like 2.7 million people on incapacity benefit and that about 1.3 million of them want to work if they can find it. We also know—the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions said it earlier—that the only group of people on incapacity benefit whose numbers are rising are those with mental health problems.

I tabled some questions to the Secretary of State to ascertain more information about that group. As I have said, I do not believe that the Budget will greatly help them. These are the figures on men with affective disorders who are drawing benefit. In 1997, there were approximately 150,000; there are now some 235,000 drawing incapacity benefit. Turning to those with neurotic and stress-related disorders, there were about 119,000 in 1997; last year it had risen to about 135,000.

For women, the overall figures have gone up. In 1997, there were 1,032,000; last year, staggeringly, there were 1,120,000. In 1997, there were about 145,000 women with mood affective disorders, in comparison with about 232,000 last year. In 1997, there were about 101,000 women with neurotic and stress-related disorders, in comparison with 114,000 last year. The group of people drawing incapacity benefit whose numbers are rising are those with mental disorders of one sort or another.

Our criticism of the new deal has always been that too much money has gone into helping people who are likely to get employment in the labour market anyway, and not enough into helping those who find it difficult to get work and then to keep it. I believe that the Budget provides nothing to help that particular group of people. If the Chancellor were more creatively and imaginatively minded, he would want to reflect on the proposals that we made in our last election manifesto for an incapacity benefit fundholder that could reach this hard-to-find group of people, help them into work and keep them there.

The final group is young mums who want child care choice. The Budget proposals on child care essentially built on last year's proposals, which helped working parents. We have to see those proposals in the context of another Government target—that of getting 17 per cent. of lone parents into work by 2010. However, some mothers and fathers want to stay at home and look after their children when they are very young. Naturally, they will receive no benefit from employer-related measures in respect of people who work.

That has been acknowlegded by no less a figure than the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. An article in The Daily Telegraph some months ago was excitingly headlined "We Failed Mothers Who Stay At Home, Admits Hewitt". In it, the right hon. Lady said:

> "I do think we have given the impression that we think all mothers should be out to work."

I am therefore disappointed that the Chancellor did not build on the proposals in the recent report on child care by the Select Committee on Work and Pensions. The Committee is dominated by Labour Members, but its report set out a choice-based model.

Finally, it will not be possible to reduce poverty effectively in the long term if family life is not stable. There is far greater equality on the continent, but the paradox is that far more payments are made there to families on high incomes. In France, parents have choice, and in Denmark women are encouraged to enter the labour market, but the key is that payments are made much higher up the income scale. I am worried by two elements in the Budget—the freezing of the family element of the child tax credit, and the fact that child benefit will not be changed. In fact, that has not increased in real terms since 1999.

Child care is a key theme for the future. I am sorry that it was not approached in the Budget in the choice-based way that some Select Committee members would prefer. In conclusion, the Budget was political in nature, rather than financial. Many of my constituents will agree with me that it offers them very little.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House for not being present for the earlier speeches in today's debate. The Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, of which I am a member, has been taking evidence on gangmasters in relation to the Morecambe bay tragedy and is sitting later than normal.

I want to talk about those elements of the Budget that I consider to be good for Cornwall. The first of the specific matters that I want to raise is the reduction of VAT on heat pumps. That might seem obscure to many hon. Members, but my constituency delights in being home to the remains of the "hot rocks" project, which the House may recall was closed by Mrs. Thatcher in the 1980s. The project was a pioneering scheme that drew heat from the ground to provide what was effectively free heating for homes, buildings and factories. Although the scheme did not last, a number of pioneering firms that were committed to the technology carried the work on, in co-operation with the Camborne School of Mines.

One of the firms involved is called Geoscience, and is based near Falmouth. Heat pumps can produce five units of heat from one unit of energy derived by using the geothermal technology. The firm was concerned about the fact that it was paying VAT on heat pumps at the normal rate. I lobbied my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary about that, and I am glad to say that he listened. As a result, the rate was reduced in the Budget to 5 per cent. The people at Geoscience are delighted at that change. Although the Budget debate may seem fairly obscure to many, people in Cornwall who have a specific answer to the world's climate problems were listened to by Ministers, and I am very grateful for that.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): That is because they have a good MP.

Ms Atherton: My hon. Friend is very kind.

Another issue exercising many of my constituents also has to do with VAT—this time as it applies to church repairs. The saga has been a long one, and most hon. Members will have heard from constituents about it. The database that my office holds of constituents who have written to ask that the Government listen to their proposals about VAT on church repairs contains a list of names that runs into four figures. I suspect that that reflects Cornwall's strength of community feeling and its tradition of church attendance. People are very closely involved in their communities and parishes. The county has some fantastic churches, but they cost a huge amount of money to repair. They are a source of great pride to the community. They grew out of the mining communities and had to be big, because they had congregations of many thousands of people. Now they may serve only a few hundred people in each village, but they are still an important part of the community. I am grateful that Ministers listened on that point, too.

I also represent many pensioners. I was out in my constituency last weekend and an older pensioner said to me, "I want you to tell them up there that for the first time in my life I have some money left in my purse at the end of the week. Now we are going to have an extra £100 and I am absolutely delighted." Older pensioners are often women who did not have pension provision when they were younger. The extra help that they will get from the Government is welcomed. They do not want the extra added to their pension, as the Opposition propose. They like having a lump sum, whether in the form of the winter fuel payment or the extra £100 to address council tax rises, because it gives them flexibility. The extra £100 was warmly welcomed in my constituency. In a debate on my local radio station, pensioners said clearly that it was what they wanted.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Does the hon. Lady agree that pensioners are welcoming a payment that will be paid to them all, without any need to fill in any application forms? As the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) pointed out, the problem with some Government pension policy is that many people—by definition, the poorest pensioners, because they were the ones who were eligible for pension credit—do not claim pension credit and so miss out, whereas if the sum were part of their pension they would be guaranteed it.

Ms Atherton: That is the problem. There are two options. One either gives a small amount to everyone, or one targets the money on those pensioners who most need it. They must also be given the assistance they need to tackle the applications. In my area, a representative from Kerrier district council will visit pensioners' homes and fill in the forms with them. Pensioners can also apply by telephone. They do not have to stand around in front of other people in some building to fill in the form. The forms have also been significantly improved. One pensioner asked me, "Why does it ask me if I have children?" As I told her, I have a family friend who is 88 and has a 13-year-old daughter. We can debate whether 88 is the age to be charging around with a 13-year-old, but that is the reality. Our lifestyles have changed and many pensioners have child care responsibilities. The forms can be complicated, but assistance is available. Pensioners in my constituency are delighted with the Budget and I thank my Front-Bench colleagues for that.

The money for schools will also be warmly welcomed. The head of Penryn school, Marie Hunter, will use some of the extra money for her fantastic summer scheme for children in the Penryn area. Last year, hundreds of young people took part in the scheme, and as a result not one of them came to the attention of the police. She is very proud of that and it is fantastic that young people who might not otherwise have the opportunity get the chance to do things. Marie Hunter lobbied me for more money to be paid directly to schools and I am sure that she will use the extra to assist with the summer scheme.

We do have problems in Cornwall, and I must raise them with Ministers. They will know that Cornwall has achieved objective 1 status—the highest level of structural funds—to tackle its long-standing economic problems. Despite the fantastic work that has been done, we still have only 59 per cent of the European average for gross domestic product. That puts us on a par with Greek islands. We are the poorest region in northern Europe, and that is tragic. It is a challenge for all of us to tackle those longstanding problems.

I do not want give the impression that the Government have not been tackling those problems in Cornwall. We are tackling the infrastructure problems. The Government are dualling the A30 at Gossmoor. Any hon. Member who has ever come to Cornwall in the summer and has tried to go from east to west will know that that huge bottleneck has been a nightmare for many years. That work is being fast-tracked by the Highways Agency. Almost everyone except Swampy agrees that that is absolutely fantastic. The Government, through Social Research Associates, are dualling the A30, and we are using objective 1 funds to assist us in that. That work will decrease journey times by 30 minutes. That may not sound much to most hon. Members, but that makes a huge difference to a five or six-hour journey.

We have the largest number of small and medium-sized businesses in the country. I often laugh when we talk about SMEs, given that when we talk about a small business, we may be talking about one person; that when we talk about a medium-sized business, we may mean a business that employs five people; and that, to some, a business with 30 employees is a large business. The definition of an SME depends on where you come from, but the money in the Budget to help small businesses will be welcomed.

As I say, we are doing a lot. We have the Eden project, which I hope many hon. Members have visited. The maritime museum in Falmouth has the small boats collection from Greenwich. What is happening with that museum, the Tate at St. Ives and our gardens is that people are coming to the county, not for the six weeks of the bucket-and-spade season, but all year round. One hotelier told a colleague, "I've got a bone to pick with you"—as every politician knows, people stand back when someone says that—"I have had to put central heating in my hotel because I've got visitors coming all year round." I think it is a real success when hoteliers have to put in central heating because tourists are visiting the country all year round.

My constituency has one of the few urban regeneration companies in the country. It is conserving the Camborne, Pool and Redruth community. The closure of the coal mines was pretty dramatic and, as result, there were dramatic responses from the Government. The situation with tin was very different. Tin mines closed over hundreds of years. There were times when the decline was sharp, but it was usually gradual and, as result, it slipped by—no one really noticed, except for people in Cornwall. As a result, there was never a sense that we had to tackle the problem, until now. In the Budget, we have money that will help the Camborne, Pool, Redruth urban regeneration company to make a difference to the lives of the people in that community.

We have the largest amount of derelict land in the country. When people think of Cornwall, the last thing they think of is derelict land. In fact, west Cornwall is full of derelict land. The money for housing in the Budget will really help us.

We are working hard in Cornwall. We are trying to tackle the problems that we have inherited. The people are committed to working for the county. The Government are working for the country. A lot of good things are happening. I ask the Government to help us with the next round of objective 1. We want quality jobs, quality homes and quality skills. There was more for us in that respect in the Budget. I thank the Government and ask them please to keep helping us.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): It is pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) in the debate, particularly as I had the pleasure of visiting the Eden project very recently. I commend that project to all hon. Members and, indeed, all members of the public, as a marvellous place to visit.

I rise to speak as a member of the Science and Technology Committee, so I shall concentrate on the Budget's implications for science. In doing so, I want to dwell on a general theme of whether the Budget will help to procure what might be called fair contracts between generations. Earlier, members of the Conservative Front Bench suggested that the Government have a tendency to profligacy and to consume the seed corn of future generations. The implication was that an unsustainable deficit today would have to be paid for by our children tomorrow.

The Budget's vision and long-term approach to science gives the lie to that accusation. It is no accident that the Chancellor used the word "science" 13 times in his speech. Investing now in science will not simply enhance the lifestyles of tomorrow but of generations to come. I worry about whether there is in Government sufficient understanding of science and enough of a scientific culture to get that investment right. Time after time, when the Science and Technology Committee seeks out the person in a Department who ought to know about mathematical models, understand a certain third world engineering project or appreciate all the other ways in which science impacts on government, it is often the case that no one can be found to deal with such matters. When the director general of the Natural Environment Research Council addressed the Committee last week, he stated that when he tried to find someone in Government to discuss matters that concerned him, he could not find anybody sensible to address.

The Government's emphasis on science is to be greatly welcomed—as is some collateral reconfiguration of the civil service. However, that must go hand in hand with intelligence, foresight and appropriate information—to retain the expertise needed in government to protect our country's productivity and affluence for generations to come.

What prospects are there of an enhanced science budget? The Committee is worried that there does not seem to be much of a vision of how energy is to be procured in decades ahead. Laudable targets for carbon reductions by the year 2020 are all very well but we must ensure that non-carboniferous energy generating systems are in place. The Committee found that the Government must take some real risks if they are to deliver a non-carboniferous or reduced carbon energy system, and thought that wave and tidal power offers the potential for an extraordinary payoff in meeting targets and reconfiguring energy systems in a non-carboniferous, non-nuclear way.

We began to get somewhere with the Department of Trade and Industry, but—truth to tell—we need the instruments for securing huge investment in a technology that is of dubious return and which perhaps involves building something a bit like the millennium dome but on its side and in the sea. For some strange reason, such a project did not appeal to people who were asked to put their hands in their pockets now for a dubious outcome in terms of a working project in, say, 2011. That money is difficult to raise through venture capital and the private system, but a Government with a vision of how we will generate energy in future really need to look at priming the pump of such enterprises. We are not talking here of the £5 million or £10 million that the Government have vouchsafed—that money is welcome—but of an awful lot more if such ideas are to go from trial to something like empirical proof.

[Mr. Tony McWalter]

Apart from energy, the general issue with the science budget relates to the huge difficulties in the education system. One of the great strengths in the British economy has been the extraordinary extent to which we have been able to generate science graduates, particularly in those subjects that require a high degree of mathematical attainment. There has been an astonishing fall in the number of people doing advanced level maths and continuing to develop those skills. However, wherever one looks in the world of science, those skills have a premium. Indeed, some might say that those skills should have a higher premium in Parliament itself, and particularly in Budget debates.

Losing the trained people that we need in many sectors becomes an issue when we face a crisis, as we did with foot and mouth disease, and find that the mathematical models of disease spread are, unfortunately, ill developed and ill defined. I suppose that we have to make policy almost quite literally on the hoof. It is a bad day when this country lacks the capacity to invest in science and its future.

We have also asked the Government to consider following the Taylor report's recommendations on investment in two new nano-fabrication facilities that involve cutting-edge nanotechnology and materials that are 10^{-9} of a centimetre. The Taylor report says that many advanced industrial countries will make their living out of such technology for the next decade or two or more. We want the capacity for people to take an idea about a system that may, for example, replace ball bearings through to manufacture, test and experiment, to see whether it is possible to turn an idea into an industry that employs people and pays our way in the world.

I say with regret that, so far, there has been decided reticence on the part of the Government to back such initiatives, but I believe that the Budget signals, in its appraisal of science, a willingness to go beyond the hesitant pussyfooting that has sometimes characterised Government responses to recommendations such as those made by Taylor. Instead, it signals the potential to secure investment that might go wrong. After all, that is the nature of this business—things can go wrong, so one might invest and get a bloody nose. However, if several such investments are made, out of the experiments and initiatives come ideas and industries for the future. Many in our society do not give much thought to the energy supply in 2015, the industrial structure of 2015 or the extent to which global warming will damage our country in 2015, but it is nevertheless in their interests to invest now for that future.

One example of a possible investment that the inventors would wish me to mention is what is called Beagle 2A, although one might call it Beagle 3, because it will follow Beagle 2 as an effort to try to understand Mars—that is, the planet—by using robotic systems. Those systems involve tremendous ingenuity, and it is possible that they have the capacity to be developed on an industrial scale. For example, a small-scale spectrometer was an integral part of the Beagle 2 project. The new project cannot be called "Beagle 3", because someone has already appropriated the name with a view to using it as a marketing ploy. That situation illustrates in a microcosm the extent to which we can invent things in Britain and have fantastic ideas—even though it must be said that Professor Pilkington had enormous difficulty raising the £25 million that he needed to get Beagle 2 under way—but then seem to lack the capacity to move from the idea, or spark, and relatively modest investment toward a system in which there is a real programme to develop volume, workers and capacity.

I know of a nanotechnology project involving a company that remains pre-revenue after six years and is in danger of dying and being taken over by the United States because the last chunk of capital and support for its 15 workers is being denied. We must try to ensure that the tremendously welcome science budget is actually converted into projects that will be of real benefit for generations to come.

I began by saying that I would emphasise the science side of the Budget quite a lot, but I also said that I would comment on the contract between the generations. If the Budget is displaying long-sightedness about the extent to which we are trying to look after the interests of future generations, it is also vital that we look after the generation in the here and now. I did not agree with the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) when he said that the £100 council tax contribution was a bribe. I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister before Christmas in which I said that the matter was one of the most vexatious issues in my constituency. I asked him to do something, so I do not think that the measure is a bribe—it is sheer responsiveness. It shows that if the burden of council tax has reached a stage at which it is no longer seen as fair and manageable—

Angus Robertson: It is a backhander, not a bribe.

Mr. McWalter: The hon. Gentleman mutters about backhanders rather than bribes. What do Opposition Members want? Do they want us to say that we will not address the issue because if we do, people will think that we are doing so for awful motives? We should tackle it because that is the right thing to do.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Gentleman is right—at least the Government have, at the very last moment, recognised the seriousness of the problem that people have been telling them about for a considerable time. However, it is a sticking-plaster solution and it is only available this year—it is not promised for future years. Surely, the Government should promise to reform the way in which we fund local government and, in particular, make sure that taxation for local government is based on people's ability to pay.

Mr. McWalter: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, although I suspect that I disagree with him about the way in which those funds are to be procured. The most difficult issue in the Budget to address is ability to pay. The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) made an excellent speech about the way in which we understand and deal with poverty, which is a problem in Wycombe and my constituency of Hemel Hempstead. I am constantly sounding off to the Chancellor about HIND—high income, none disposable—people. Some individuals do not have any disposable income because their housing costs are so high that de facto they are in poverty, even if on paper they do not appear to be.

I dealt with a case in my constituency involving a single mum with two children. She drove a fairly new BMW 5 series, but in fact she had almost no disposable income, and her company required her to drive that car because it wanted her to portray a certain image to clients. The taxation that she paid on her income and the car meant that the family—and I visited their home—were in desperate straits. What constitutes poverty is therefore not always clear, and we must look at disposable income. I am not chastising the Government—it is a hugely difficult issue. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has pointed out in the past that it is difficult to make benefits sensitive to housing costs, which contribute to the problem of achieving a fair system. As those housing cost difficulties are addressed—and I welcome the emphasis in the Budget on the Barker report and the Miles report—the housing system will become more manageable and housing costs will bear down less harshly on people in Wycombe, Hemel Hempstead and other constituencies. The contract between generations, the emphasis on housing and the attempt to provide appropriate resources will be important in future and are integral virtues of the Budget.

I touched on the current difficulties facing the older generation when I spoke about relief on council tax, but it would not be right not to say something about the pensioners, particularly in my constituency, of the Dexion company who are victims of a measure that I call the "The Dangerous Dogs (Pensions) Act 1995". It came into force on 6 April 1997, less than a month before the Government took office, and established a system in which pensioners of companies that went bust got their pension if the fund could manage it. If, however, people were not quite pensioners, they would be at the end of the line and might well end up with nothing. That is a most extraordinary injustice.

I have a constituent who is a pensioner now but was not yet a pensioner at the time the company went into liquidation. He had paid for 38 years and was two days away from getting his pension when the foul Pensions Act 1995 bit him. Progress has been made on the issue and, as the debate continues, I hope people will see that just as we must do the right thing by future generations to protect their interests—I have suggested that there are various ways in which the Budget does that—we must do the right thing also by the current generation who have been the victims of a major injustice.

I shall conclude by saying something about the resources that the Budget generates. I have spoken about science and welcomed the tremendous new initiative, but suggested that there should be close parliamentary monitoring to ascertain whether those resources are used wisely and well or foolishly and badly. The Opposition always assume that if we set out to raise money, that is the propaedia to throwing it all in the bin. We must ensure here in Parliament—all of us, Opposition, Back Benchers and Front Benchers—that the money is used wisely and well.

I welcome the Chancellor's emphasis on resource accounting, but I sometimes wonder whether we do it well enough. I am particularly worried about some of the things that are going on in the health service, and I hope that those on the Front Bench will take heed of the fact that a Labour Back Bencher sometimes worries about whether the money coming into the system is being spent as effectively as it might be. I have in mind the fact that the budget of my local strategic health authority is scheduled to go up from £900 million a year to £1.6 billion. That is a huge increase, which takes us out of a condition of deficit financing, to which the hon. Member for Wycombe referred—a condition of always being in debt and of people always making decisions based on the fact that the books do not quite balance and we must make more cuts. We are not in that position now, I am told. The debt-ridden health system should finally be a thing of the past and we should have the resources to tackle the recommendations of the Wanless report.

I very much welcome that, but the question is whether we are making the best use of the resources, the capital, the investment and the people we have. If we do the resource account badly, we could end up with the situation that we experienced at Hemel Hempstead hospital. For all I know, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury may have been born there. His mother still lives in Hemel Hempstead. The new maternity unit is nine years old and still sparkling new, with a wonderful special care baby unit. What did management do? They said, "Well, it's very nice and it cost us quite a bit of money, but unfortunately we're a bit debt ridden and it's very hard to get staff these days. It's an expensive part of the country and people always want to go somewhere else because their quality of life would be better, so sorry about this, but we are going to put the slammers on it. We're going to shut it."

If we have built up resources costing millions of pounds and we shut them early, that is as close to stupidity as policy making ever could be. We must ensure that, if we are going to do resource accounting, it is not merely a technical exercise that we do on a piece of paper with a quill but something that we do in practice by using the judgment of those who understand the bricks and mortar, who see the capacity, and who talk to the people involved. We also need active Members of Parliament and those who assist them to try to monitor all this expenditure, to ensure that it is used wisely and well.

On my own patch, I want to see the Wanless agenda introduced. I welcome the extra money because, once we get away from a deficit health system, the issues that are never addressed, such as mental health, geriatric help or dementia—issues that are always right down at the far end of the food chain under a deficit health system—can now be addressed. However, they will not be addressed if we do not do our resource accounting properly.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McWalter: I was just about to give up, but I would be happy to take the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Mr. Francois: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way just before he sits down. Does he agree that a particular problem associated with NHS expenditure is the fact that private finance initiative projects are often so bureaucratic that it takes a long time for the system to spend the money, and that a great deal of that money is therefore wasted because of the time that it takes to get through it? Surely something can be done to make the system more efficient.

Mr. McWalter: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman's intervention was so tame and tender. I agree with what he says, but there has also been a lot of talk from Members on his own Benches about how wonderful PFI is. In my local health trust, the local PFI outgoings for this year are zero, but it still has a huge problem managing its resource base. I hate to think what would happen in grandiose systems in which such outgoings were quite substantial. The problem of being in chronic debt would simply be regenerated all over again. I understand why the Government sometimes want these projects to be managed at so-called arm's length. The trouble is, however, that if the arms get too long, the projects end up out of sight of those who are committed to the process of parliamentary scrutiny. We must make very sure that that never happens.

I began by making certain points about science and about justice between the generations. This is a wise Budget, in that much of what it does seeks a balance of interest between the generations. I welcome the resources that it proposes and I look forward to the intensive process of scrutinising in great detail all the projects that will emerge from those extra resources.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter). I was interested to hear that he was about to give up, as I am sure the Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate in his constituency, Mike Penning, will be interested. His comment was really just a confirmation of what the rest of the House, particularly Opposition Members, knew already.

It is a characteristic of Chancellors that they claim credit for everything that goes right and blame everyone else for everything that goes wrong. This Budget went in for fiscal tightening and monetary loosening, but that state of affairs cannot go on indefinitely. I suspect that it was arrived at bearing in mind the date at which the British people will be able to give their verdict on it. That is why it would be useful to point out to them why we believe that it is unsustainable in the long run.

Certain aspects of the Budget are to be warmly welcomed. I give the Chancellor credit for achieving his predicted growth rate this year—contrary to the predictions of many well informed economic commentators, and, indeed, to my own forecast. I suppose that it was that, alongside the relatively full employment of which the Chancellor made much, that allowed him to proceed with what I believe to be his unsustainable expenditure increases. Indeed, were it not for those two factors, I suspect that those expenditure increases would become reckless rather than unsustainable.

Other aspects of the Budget are to be welcomed. Many Members have paid tribute to the £100 one-off payment to pensioners, but it is a bit mean giving with one hand and taking more away with the other. We have all seen the considerable increases in council tax this year, and there were even bigger increases last year. I am sure that we have all had difficult cases in our surgeries. For example, a man told me in my surgery the other day that his small occupational pension takes his income above all benefit entitlements, but that the increase in his occupational pension and state pension this year is much less than the increase in the council tax. It is because of the increase in council tax, therefore, that his standard of living will be reduced. That is unsustainable and unsatisfactory, and we must consider how the money raised locally in council tax reflects more accurately local government functions. One main reason why council tax has got out of control is that the Government keep giving local authorities more and more duties and responsibilities without providing the proper funding.

I want to comment on the fiscal side of the Budget, and then on the monetary side. As I said, this is a fiscal-tightening Budget, which is due largely to not indexing the relief on most taxes, as table A3.1 on page 210 of the Red Book shows. As a result, we will have fiscal tightening of about £750 million which, taking into account enforcement and compliance, will total about £1 billion. Those are fairly small figures in historical terms for this Government, because the previous economic situation must be taken into account. They have already introduced 60 extra taxes, which is a doubling of the rate of tax take, costing the average family some £5,000. I am sure that, when it comes to the next general election, the British public will not be slow to take on board those tax increases.

The only exception to the indexing of relief was small: relief on inheritance tax was raised from £255,000 to £263,000. That is small beer for many families. In many cases, particularly in the south of England, and especially in a constituency such as mine, the value of the house alone will use up nearly all inheritance tax relief. Nevertheless, the rise was welcome.

That is completely overshadowed by the many other forms of relief that the Government have not indexed over seven years, such as stamp duty. When we left office in 1997, stamp duty raised a few hundred million pounds in revenue; today, it raises several billion pounds. That is because seven years ago the relief of £60,000 used to buy a reasonable, small house, but today, in most constituencies in the south of England, it would be impossible to buy much more than a box for £60,000. The stamp duty imposed by this Government is becoming a significant cost to many people who have to move house for their job.

I want to comment on strip stamps, which are not what some hon. Members might suppose, but are related to the fraud and evasion of tax on spirits. I declare an interest as the chairman of the all-party wine group. I have made a spirited speech on this subject in Westminster Hall. The Government—I spoke to the Economic Secretary last night on the subject, and I am grateful to him for offering to talk further to members of the trade—say that £600 million a year is lost in fraud, and that strip stamps, which are duty-paid stamps to be put over corks or caps of bottles of spirits, will cost only £50 million to introduce. That is an overestimate followed by an underestimate. The trade reckons that roughly £250 million in revenue is lost, and that the measure could cost as much as £150 million to implement. The Government therefore still have a lot of thinking to do on strip stamps.

Sir Robert Smith: It is clear from evidence given by Customs and Excise to the Scottish Affairs Committee that it has not got to grips with the current ways of trying to tackle fraud before imposing a bureaucratic nightmare that could, in fact, open the door to other forms of fraud.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I agree. The all-party wine group went to Dover to observe the work of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, and found that what I have called on the Government to do in the Finance Bill for seven years has now been done. Customs and Excise has installed a large machine that can X-ray an entire heavy goods vehicle in one go, and more customs officers have been employed. When the Government came to power, they said that they would cut the number of customs officers.

All those are helpful enforcement measures, but I think that the Government should consider all possible means of enforcement rather than imposing a bureaucratic burden on the spirits industry. I do not even think that it will necessarily work, because the strip stamp system is inherently open to fraud. It has not worked in Poland, or in other countries.

Let me now say something about the Government's monetary policy. Table C1 on page 244 of the Red Book shows that the Government are borrowing £37.5 billion this year, and the amount is rising. It also tells us that gross gilt sales this year will amount to £49.8 billion. If those amounts continue to rise, they will become unsustainable—and we should take into account not just the figures above the line, which are shown in the Red Book, but those accumulating below the line, which are not. I am thinking of, for example, the £20 billion debt accumulated by the Strategic Rail Authority. The Government hardly bought a rail, hardly opened a new station, to build up that debt. The money was largely spent on consultants and lawyers in the process of putting Railtrack into administration—a shocking mismanagement of Government funds.

There are several hundred billion pounds in the private finance initiative. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) referred to the PFI, which we, the Conservative Government, introduced. It was an excellent idea, and the Government are taking great credit—the Chancellor did it again in the Budget statement—for building a tremendous number of new hospitals through it. The problem is that many of the contracts are let inadequately by the Government. My hon. Friend mentioned some of the problems, prompted by an intervention from me. The Government must become much smarter in letting those contracts and in wording them, so that some of the risk really is passed to the private sector. Otherwise they could borrow the money more cheaply themselves, and might as well fund projects directly.

On page 271 of the Red Book, the Government say all the right things. They say that the public sector contracts to buy services from the private sector

"so as to take advantage of private sector management skills incentivised by having private finance at risk."

They go on to say, in the same paragraph,

"With PFI, the public sector defines what is required to meet public needs and ensures, by contract, delivery of the outputs it sets. It has rights under those contracts to change the output required from time to time."

The trouble is that it does not do that. There are so many exceptions in the contracts, and the private sector is so much smarter at negotiating the exceptions, that the contracts are often extremely weak, and in some cases could be funded more cheaply by the public purse.

As for the Government's so-called efficiency savings, there were great headlines in the press on Thursday morning suggesting that the Chancellor had somehow shot the Conservative fox. That was nonsense. The Government have taken on 390,000 civil servants, and will secure efficiency savings by making 40,000 redundant. They have been taking on civil servants at a rate of 511 a week for the past year. They are far too timid. They are doing too little too late. In any case, as always, they are adopting Conservative policies without having the necessary reasons or philosophy to follow them through.

In the past, the Government and indeed the Chancellor have made great play of public service agreements. The Chief Secretary grins; he may wish to consider this carefully, as he has negotiated public service agreements in the past. The Chancellor abolished 130 of them in the Budget. Having taken great trouble to negotiate with Secretaries of State for other Departments, he finds that they cannot live up to the agreements and has to abolish them. I praise the Government for at least beginning to think about efficiency savings. It is too little, too late, but perhaps it is a good start.

Others wish to speak, so I shall not take long. The Government are beginning at long last to consider outputs rather than inputs. Whenever the Prime Minister hears a criticism during Prime Minister's Question Time of the malfunction or dysfunction of any Department, his only answer is that the Government are spending so many more hundreds of millions or billions on the problem. He does not say that the money buys, for example, so many more operations. In recent years, expenditure on the health service has increased by 37.5 per cent., but in the same period, output in terms of operations has increased by only 4.8 per cent. Those figures clearly demonstrate that expenditure in Departments is not as good as it should be.

Let us consider the social security budget. We are spending approximately £60 billion to £70 billion on the NHS, but it is predicted that we shall spend £150 billion on social security by 2005–06. In 2000–01, that budget broke the £100 billion mark for the first time. It has increased by 50 per cent. in five years. One does not begrudge giving people a hand up rather than a handout when they need it, but we must ascertain whether the money is being spent wisely.

Until last week, I was a housing spokesman for our party. When in an official capacity, I join the ranks of the silent ones, but when I am on the Back Benches, I can make speeches. It is a shocking indictment of the Government—[Interruption.] If the Chief Secretary would listen to me instead of gesticulating amusingly, he might like to take account of this shocking statistic. After seven years of a Labour Government, the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has confirmed that we have the highest number of homeless families that the country has ever experienced. That is a shocking indictment of the Government. I intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) to emphasise that the hard facts in those global statistics are that the number of homeless families with children has increased and the number of those living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has more than doubled from 4,500 to more than 10,000. Putting people in bed and breakfast is a huge waste of human and financial resources. They have a miserable life.

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

We were building almost double the amount of social housing when we left office in 1997—some 35,000 houses compared with approximately 20,000 that the Government are building today. They are not building enough social and affordable houses. We have suggested extending the right to buy and using the proceeds to fund a considerable increase in affordable and social housing without any cost to the taxpayer.

Table C13 on page 269 of the Red Book shows that the ODPM's capital budget will increase from £1.5 billion to only £2.4 billion. How will the Government start to solve some of the housing problems, let alone fund the huge sustainable communities plans under which they have committed themselves to spending a great deal? The Prime Minister chairs the Cabinet Committee that deals with the Thames gateway community project. It is called Misc 22 and likes to remain secret because it produces neither a sustainable plan nor communities worthy of the name. It certainly has not managed to attract the very large amount of private finance that it will need to attract to build the infrastructure to accompany the 140,000 houses that are predicted for the Thames gateway over the next 12 to 14 years.

The Government have a problem with their housing policy. They have a problem with their communities plans. They are putting the wrong houses in the wrong places. We do not have joined-up government. They are not committing themselves to the infrastructure that is needed for the communities plans. There is much to be done. Although, as always with this Chancellor, the Budget glittered on the day, once one starts to get into the detail, one begins to see a number of black holes.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Several hon. Members are hoping to catch my eye. If contributions are brief, more may be successful in doing so.

5.35 pm

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I can agree with the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on one thing: we need to take action urgently on housing. In that respect, I am pleased that in Budget 2004 the Chancellor paid such regard to Kate Barker's report. Housing is featuring now, and will feature in future. I am particularly pleased about that. It means that in my constituency in north Staffordshire, there will be a £2 billion housing investment programme over 15 years, and we shall invest in housing as we need to do.

Listening to the Budget debate, including the golden oldie that we heard from the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), about the golden rule, I was pleased that the current Chancellor has produced a Budget that will really deal with the economic situation and with investment in jobs, which we desperately need, especially in areas such as mine, where we have the huge legacy of Conservative Governments—the destruction of many of our traditional industries. We must now provide the employment opportunities.

The Budget commends itself to me because the Chancellor is genuinely dealing with environmental issues. Only months ago, we heard from the Government's chief adviser that the threat of global warming was as great as the threat of terrorism. It is important that the Chancellor is at last setting out ways to address global warming. We have environmental issues and we have the prospect at long last of action on energy efficiency. Those of us who have campaigned over many years can now see that there will be real improvement that will make a difference. Many environmental groups will welcome that move in the Budget.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) talked about the Scotch Whisky Association, and that reminded me that Budgets in the past were often just about smoking and drinking. Whatever he might say about the changes that he would like for Scotch whisky, I have read the small print of the Budget and I am pleased. The Campaign for Real Ale has campaigned alongside the Titanic brewery in my constituency to extend the small breweries relief. It is good that we have a listening Chancellor who is looking at the issues in regional economies. It is important that we listen to what people are saying to us.

I see in his place my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), who has done so much work on football. In the Budget there is at long last an undertaking to look at the role of football supporters trusts. Many of my hon. Friends, and Opposition Members, have had to deal with the prospect of football clubs going into administration. The Chancellor and the Inland Revenue needed to think about that issue, and there it is—a small welcome paragraph saying that the Chancellor will look at the work of football supporters trusts.

The Budget is about jobs, pensions and, more importantly, education. It recognises that, if we are to provide the boost to the economy that is desperately needed and to build on the success that the Chancellor has had so far, we need to concentrate on employment and ensuring that people have a proper, fair wage for the work that they do. That is why the improvements to the minimum wage, particularly for 16 and 17-year-olds, will be so welcomed in my constituency. No action is ever enough, but the Chancellor has shown that the Government care about people receiving a decent wage, work being made to pay, and local economies being boosted, so that we can have that sense of well-being that does so much to improve our areas.

One key aspect of the Budget is the huge investment in education. I have to say a word of thanks to the Chancellor, because Stoke-on-Trent is again to be at the forefront of the programme to allocate extra money to the rebuilding of secondary schools. We could never even have dreamt of such a programme under the Conservative Government.

The Government are not merely dealing with schools, but are starting with early years provision, and have given a commitment that every deprived ward will have a children's centre by 2008. Only last week my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children visited my constituency and saw how desperately we need a children's centre at Chell Heath. I must tell the Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that it is critical that the investment outlined in the Budget be made to work on the ground.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) mentioned people with disabilities. There are elements in the Budget that will make ours a fairer society for people with disabilities, which will be welcomed throughout the country.

Bearing in mind that you wish us to be brief in this closing part of the Budget debate, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall concentrate on just one issue, which I hope the Chief Secretary will address when he replies to the debate. The Budget has given a real commitment to put into practice the findings of Sir Michael Lyons's review. If we are to build on all the investment in the economy, it is important to ensure that in any relocation, civil service jobs go not only to the larger "premiership" cities such as Liverpool, Manchester and Birmingham, but to other urban areas that have so far not had their fair share of Government jobs. I put in a particular plea for north Staffordshire to feature in the work that the Chancellor does in the coming months, so that new jobs will be brought to our area.

The two back-up reports for Sir Michael Lyons's review—undertaken by Evian and King Sturge—do not really take account of the extent of deprivation in areas such as north Staffordshire. They tend to see the benefits of taking jobs away from the south-east as flowing from possible synergy with investment that has already been made in certain other parts of the country—for example, in the health jobs already in Sheffield or the passport office already in Liverpool. In transferring those jobs, location is all-important: location, location, location. North Staffordshire should be one of those locations.

My colleagues who represent other north Staffordshire constituencies feel as strongly as the North Staffordshire chamber of commerce, the local authorities and I do that the jobs that are brought to north Staffordshire should not be just back-street jobs, but the professional and managerial jobs that will help to regenerate the area. The introduction of such jobs would sit side by side with the housing pathfinder work that is bringing in £2 billion over 15 years, and would match the investment in learning and skills spearheaded by our learning and skills council and by Advantage West Midlands in the north Staffordshire regeneration zone.

We have to make certain that when the Government tell us how they will proceed with the relocation of jobs, they have a transparent procedure. If the so-called consultants, who have looked at some 102 cities around the country, have not bothered to flag up north Staffordshire as an area that can benefit, I will want to know why. I want the Chief Secretary to get back to the people of north Staffordshire and start top-level talks to ensure that everything that we want to do on the ground will be reinforced by a proper relocation of jobs to the area.

I hope that the Government can take away that message from this debate. We in north Staffordshire are very keen and eager in that regard, and we want nothing more than to work as closely as possible with the Government to regenerate our economy not only nationally, but in north Staffordshire, where this issue matters so much.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley), who spoke very powerfully for her constituents. I shall talk about whether the Labour tax and spend experiment of the past four years has actually worked, but first I want to make a couple of preliminary remarks. I start where my hon. Friend—and neighbour—the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) began, with the so-called shot fox of cost savings and waste in government. I suspect that he is not really in favour of shooting foxes in any event, but as far as I can see this fox is alive and well and living in Whitehall.

We Conservatives have been saying that there is a lot of Government waste and bad spending, and suddenly the Chancellor has said, "Yes, we're wasting £20 billion a year, and 40,000 jobs in the civil service are surplus to requirements." That is a big change in the terms of trade in the debate on tax and spend, because until now, we have been told that every pound that we attempt to save in public services is a pound off the nurses' pay bill, or a pound off front-line services. Now we know that, as we have been saying all along, it is possible to save money in central Government without hitting front-line services.

As I listened to the Budget speech, three points struck me straight away that bear repeating. First, the Budget was highly political. Almost all of it was about us: about Conservative policies that the Chancellor has rejected, and about others—those involving saving money—that he has accepted; he had very little of merit to say for himself. Secondly, he made that last point clear by repeatedly talking about tax rates that he had decided to freeze, as if such taxes normally went up every year and such a freeze somehow constituted generosity. He said that he was generously freezing inheritance tax, income tax and capital gains tax, which proves how little he had to say.

The third point that rang out from the Chancellor's speech is that tax is to come: if Labour gets in again, there will be third-term tax rises. The two figures that jumped out of the Budget speech were the £120 billion that the Chancellor plans to spend over the next five years, and the £140 billion that he plans to borrow.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is making a characteristically robust contribution. In the context of taxes, is he aware of the sage verdict of the noble Lord Hattersley? In an article in The Guardian of 13 June 1995, he said that Labour could be either the party of higher taxes and proud of it, or the party of higher taxation that it is ashamed to describe, afraid to admit to and incapable of calculating with any accuracy.

Mr. Cameron: I am afraid that, as someone who writes a column for The Guardian website, I take the view that The Guardian is something to write for rather than to read. So I did not read that article, but I shall look it up.

In the time remaining, I shall try to answer two questions: has most of the extra money spent by Labour on our public services been wasted, and if so, why? Those are the two most important questions in British politics today, and the answers to them will probably determine the outcome of the next general election.

Of course, no one would claim that all the money has been wasted, but the case for saying that tax and spend, as an approach to improving our public services, has failed is overwhelming. We know that tax revenue has increased from £271 billion in 1996–97 to £429 billion in the forthcoming year. That amounts to an extra £6,300 for every family in this country. It has not all gone on paying off debt, because Government spending has increased from £317 billion in 1997 to £488 in the forthcoming year—a similar increase. Of course, the Government can and do point to building projects either completed or under way, and some successes on outcomes. I grant that in some respects, notably for primary school results, but the overall picture, as we have heard from many Conservative Members, is pretty dire.

In our hospitals, there are a million people still on waiting lists, with mean and median waiting times for in-patient treatment up over the last four years. In our schools, truancy is up by a fifth since 1997, with 33,000 children leaving school each year without a GCSE. On our streets, violent crime is up by two-thirds, with gun crime doubled, yet the Home Office budget has increased by two-thirds over the Government's period of office.

I believe that anger against the Government has been sharpened by three distinct questions being formed in the public mind. The first is a question about price. When inflation is low and the price of some goods in the shops is falling, people are asking why the cost of government and the public services is rising so rapidly.

The second question is about quality. Families enjoy ever greater choice, and usually greater quality, in the areas of expenditure that they control, such as the family holiday or the family car. They are asking why the quality in the areas that they do not control—usually in the public sector—is often so poor.

The third question is about how the moneys to pay for Labour's tax and spend experiment have been raised. Put simply, the question people ask is why Labour never admitted to plans for a tax and spend programme before introducing one. Before the last election, we heard nothing about national insurance increases and nothing about council tax increases. There was never any admission that we were moving into a tax and spend era, yet we all know that there have been 60 tax rises.

For a while, the stealth tax approach of raising money through ever more ingenious routes actually worked. The raid on the pension funds was not felt immediately. The hikes in stamp duty were felt by those who moved house, but not by those who did not. It was the increase in council tax—up 70 per cent. since 1997—that affected every family in the country. Interestingly, opinion polls show that almost everyone accepts that the principal cause of the increases is central Government. The same goes for national insurance contributions, because people see the money coming out of their pay packets.

Conservative Members aim to prove that much of the extra money raised in taxes has been wasted. I would argue that when even the Chancellor himself admits that 40,000 jobs can be cut out of the public sector, and £20 billion saved, without cuts to front-line services, we are well on our way. I commend my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor for his work on those problems.

We also have to explain why the Chancellor has failed in his mission to transform public services through tax and spend. Such a "narrative", to use a new Labour term, is not important for presentational reasons alone; it should form an important part of winning the intellectual argument about how we would do things differently and why a different approach would work.

The Prime Minister's mantra about public services is "investment plus reform". He has a neat addendum when he says that Conservatives are against the investment, and that Liberal Democrats—and most of his own Back Benchers—are against reform. That is his neat mantra, but in order to explain why the money has been wasted, we have to prove that the reform has been a chimera and has not happened. I believe that it is easy to demonstrate that, which is exactly what I shall do in my remaining time.

A key part of the task is to explain the different stages of Labour's reform since 1997. The Opposition have not said nearly enough about that, but the fact is that since taking office, Labour has completely changed direction on public services. Stage one was ruthless centralisation, scrapping almost every area of Conservative devolution and choice: nursery vouchers, trust hospitals, fundholding GPs, the internal market and grant-maintained schools. Anything that devolved power in the public services went.

The second stage, which took place under the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) when he was Secretary of State for Health, and the current Home Secretary, who was then Secretary of State for Education and Employment, was rigorous centralisation and control from Whitehall. Stage three, now under way, is a complete reversal of stage two, with a new emphasis on decentralisation. The rhetoric accompanying that decentralisation was powerful. The Prime Minister's rhetoric is always extremely powerful, I find, but the reality is rather more flimsy. Foundation hospitals are a sort of return to trust hospitals, but the concept does not have much meaning. Financial flows are the new thing in the health service, but they are like a half-baked return to the internal market.

The best example of new Labour's lack of clear thinking on how to reform the public services is the Education Act 2002. The House will recall that that legislation was about earned autonomy—that is, giving successful schools the right to manage more of their affairs. We debated it for months: it was passed two years ago, but the earned autonomy powers have never been introduced. Apparently, the Government have decided to give all schools more autonomy, so earned autonomy has gone out of the window. Have schools got more autonomy now? Of course not.

Another element in explaining the Government's failure over public services is the web of bureaucracy on which their reforms rely. That is a subject that deserves more comment. Any major piece of new Labour reforming legislation has at its heart the requirement that plans and strategies be drawn up and published. Such plans include those for policing and for combating antisocial behaviour; indeed, local government now has more plans than Soviet Russia used to have. To rephrase the John Lewis slogan, local government is never knowingly underplanned.

Individually, the plans sound harmless, or even quite attractive. Taken together, however, they have spawned a culture of paperwork and bureaucracy in the public services. The best example is in policing, where every stop and search has to be recorded, and the paperwork involved in processing one arrest now takes up to five hours.

A third element in an explanation of why the waste has happened is more widely understood. It is the over extension of targets set by central Government. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold said earlier, many of those targets and public service agreements have been scrapped. The Government are now in headlong retreat, scrapping the targets that they introduced with such fanfare only a few years ago. However, the damage has already been done: the Government set off in one direction, they are now heading in another, and the taxpayer has been wholly ripped off meanwhile.

A fourth and little noticed element in the story of waste, and of why Government reform has not worked, is the continuing strength of trade union influence. That may surprise people in this day and age, but anyone involved in the purchase or provision of private finance initiative projects will explain how schemes have been stalled while unions seek guarantees that they will be wholly staffed by public sector workers. I know one or two people in that area of work, and they tell me that rumours abound that the Chancellor tends to bend to such requests, in return for pledges of union support in a future Labour leadership contest. Who are we to question—

Mr. Watson indicated dissent.

Mr. Cameron: I see that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson) is chuckling at that. I believe that he has something of a trade union past. He probably knows more about it than I do.

Mr. Watson: I know that it is complete nonsense.

Mr. Cameron: My fifth point in explaining Labour waste, and why Government money has been wasted, is that an analysis of what I can only call "the new salariat" is needed. A vast new industry has been created, made up of regulatory bodies and agencies carved out of Government Departments. For instance, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs spawned the Food Standards Agency, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport produced Ofcom, and the Department of Transport gave birth to the Strategic Rail Authority. Those are three examples, but I am sure that Opposition Members could name another 33.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: Certainly, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will give me another example of these new regulatory agencies in his intervention.

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman used to work in broadcasting. How many bodies were merged to form Ofcom?

Mr. Cameron: A number of bodies were merged to form Ofcom, but what is interesting is the salaries paid to the people who work there. The new regulatory body industry is growing in size and scale all the time. Staff numbers and salary levels at all the agencies are on the increase, as is the incidence of "mission creep", yet none of the mother Departments—the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Department of Health or the Department of Trade and Industry, and so on—has ever seemed to get any smaller.

Most important of all is the fact that Labour's reforms have included no significant element of consumer choice. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is fond of making the point—and it is a good one—that introducing an element of consumer choice into the public services means that the people who work in those services will tend to look downwards at the customer, rather than upwards at the bureaucracy. That point is wholly lost on the members of the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Webb: I thought that the Conservatives had proposed that Ofcom's scope should be increased to take on the BBC as well.

Mr. Cameron: Certainly, and that would mean that the BBC would no longer regulate itself, which would be an improvement. My point is straightforward. All those Departments have spawned new agencies. The Department for Transport is the best example, with all the different regulatory bodies and now the Strategic Rail Authority, which does what the Department used to do. Is the Department for Transport now smaller? I bet it is not.

We have all read reports about the Labour party's support for freedom of choice, but virtually nothing has been done to introduce or extend it in the public sector. That is the real reason for the Government's failure to reform the public services adequately and for the waste of money that we have seen. That last part of the explanation for Labour's failure leads most clearly to our own prescription of choice and decentralisation. However, I urge my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset not to ignore the other parts. It may be a rather complex chain of interlocking arguments about changes in direction, waste, bureaucracy, unionisation, targets and central control, but it is the truth. In any event, it leads to a relatively simple conclusion that anyone can grasp: the Government have taken taxpayers' money and wasted it, and they have failed to tell the truth about that.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I was interested in the analysis made by the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) of the past six or seven years, but he did not say how he would solve some of the problems that he outlined. It is worth recalling what happened when his party was in power. He talked about money being wasted on the public services, but I remember hospital closures. I remember people having to lie on trolleys because they could not get a bed. That is the Conservative legacy, and the hon. Gentleman seems to want to take us back to those days. We do not want to go back.

People still remember school closures under the previous Administration and cuts in teacher numbers. No new schools were built. The hon. Gentleman wants to take us back to those days, in the name of what he calls waste, but there will always be an element of waste, as he well knows. To use that to justify taking the country back six or seven years is disgraceful. The hon. Gentleman should be honest and open and say that that is what he intends.

I remember the years when waiting lists were long. We have reduced them. I remember when few new doctors were trained, but we are producing thousands of new doctors. In the Tory years, the number of nurses fell, but under us, it has increased. That is what we should be talking about, and I am glad that the Budget will continue those trends. The hon. Gentleman said that 1 million people are on the waiting list, but under this Government the number is falling. Under the Conservatives' policies, there would be 2 million, 3 million or 4 million people on the waiting list, and we would have hospital closures.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the PFI, but the benefits of that initiative are debatable. It is like the Bible: everyone has a different view of it. I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was his party that introduced the PFI, and that was when the problems started, not in 1997. The Conservatives did not even manage to build a new hospital under the PFI, but they want to take the credit for the good aspects and none of the blame for the bad. They cannot rewrite history, no matter how often they try.

I welcome the Pensions Bill. I am not ashamed to say that I have been a trade unionist for many years, and we have campaigned for the Bill, which is now in Committee. It will be amended, but it is a good Bill. In Coventry, we have suffered the closure of Massey Ferguson, which saw people put on the scrapheap, and they did not get a decent occupational pension. The issue is going to the House of Lords, so we cannot say too much about it, but it is worth reminding the Opposition that they introduced the Pensions Act 1995, which created many of the present problems with occupational schemes. We do not need any lessons from them.

Mr. Letwin: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with us that unclaimed assets should be available to help to resolve those problems?

Mr. Cunningham: Before I agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, I would want to know the value of the unclaimed assets and how long it would take to realise them because we could be buying a pig in a poke if we listened to him. I would want to know the answer to that, what sums are involved and a bit more about what he is proposing.

Rob Marris: On the sums involved, some schemes, notably that proposed by Professor Ros Altmann, have been touted as costing £100 million a year. I have corresponded with her by e-mail, and the total package that she proposes involves, on average, £100 million a year over 60 years—£6 billion of Government money.

Mr. Cunningham: I am glad that my hon. Friend has reminded me of that, and I am equally glad that I did not answer the right hon. Gentleman's question in the way that he wanted me to.

The increase in the minimum wage is another part of the Budget that I obviously welcome. Lots of my hon. Friends would like it to be a little higher, but any increase is bound to be welcome.

Mr. Letwin: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again, as we seem to be having an interesting trilateral discussion. To handle the point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), if there were £6 billion of proved, unclaimed assets, would the hon. Gentleman agree to using that money for this purpose?

Mr. Cunningham: I am not going to answer hypothetical questions; I repeat that I have not seen the figures, so it is pointless trying to push that argument.

The business rate change is something else that I certainly welcome in the Budget. For the first time in many years, local authorities will be able to share out the rate, and they are bound to see that as being just. We must remember that the Conservative Government used the business rate to justify introducing the poll tax in the first place, but the business rate accounted for only 1.5 per cent. of any company's turnover.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): My hon. Friend mentions the minimum wage. Does he recall the Conservative party's forecasts that the minimum wage would destroy jobs? Can he confirm that many jobs have been created in his constituency, as in mine, since the introduction of the minimum wage?

Mr. Cunningham: I can certainly confirm that. If my memory serves me correctly—I am sure that my hon. Friend would put me right if not—the Conservative party forecast that about 1 million jobs would be lost.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the advantages of the minimum wage and good wages for workers are that they encourage employers to invest in their work force, so we get away from a low-wage, low-skill economy, which is the last place that Britain needs to be in the 21st century?

Mr. Cunningham: I am glad that my hon. Friend raises that issue. I work in industry, and from time to time the House debates the lack of skills and, in some instances, people's lack of ability to acquire skills. Decent wages encourage people to take jobs in, for example, manufacturing. In the past, young people have not always seen manufacturing as a way forward and a secure future because of upturns and downturns in the economy. Decent wages always act as an incentive, and we are looking for incentives to get young people back into industry and to acquire the necessary skills. Again, they can use decent wages, with further education and ultimately university, as a stepping stone, so that their knowledge and quality of life are increased. It is welcome that the Government have introduced the minimum wage.

Opposition Members have talked about homelessness. I do not know the current homelessness figures, but I certainly remember that, under the Conservative Government, hon. Members did not have to walk very far from the House to find a lot of homeless people living in cardboard boxes. We do not see so much of that today. However, we must be concerned if a homeless problem is building up. It is worth reminding ourselves that councils were not allowed to build council houses under the previous Government. Opposition spokesmen say that that problem could be solved by allowing more council house sales and using the proceeds, but I seem to remember that local authorities were not allowed to use the proceeds. Once again, the Conservative party is back to the policies that it had when it was in government, and we know where that took us. Unemployment is now the lowest in our country's history, which says a lot about how to tackle poverty. High unemployment makes more demands on the National Health Service, benefits and other public services.

Once again, the Chancellor's forecasts of growth have been correct. All the pundits admitted that they got it wrong and that my right hon. Friend got it right, but then they said he might be proved wrong nine month down the road. Anyone who can forecast growth nine months ahead must be good. I am sure that most companies would agree.

Mr. Borrow: Over the past five or six years, businesses large and small in my constituency have appreciated the economic stability provided by Labour Governments, which allows them to plan and invest for the future, in contrast to 18 years of Conservative Government, under various Chancellors.

Mr. Cunningham: In an interview on Budget day or not long after, Digby Jones, director general of the Confederation of British Industry, welcomed the fact that businesses could plan their costs and wages. Anything in the Budget that stabilises, reinforces and encourages businesses, large or small, must be a good thing.

This is the second Budget in which the Chancellor has given extra impetus to the development of brownfield sites. In many inner cities, particularly in parts of Coventry, many brownfield sites that have been derelict for many years are now being developed. Equally, though, we must achieve a balance. If every brownfield site is developed, factories might be built on greenfield sites.

As a movie fan, I also welcome the assistance to the film industry. Many of the special effects used in Hollywood movies have been developed by talents in the British industry.

Mr. Letwin: Does that mean that the hon. Gentleman regrets the passing of the film tax break, which threatened to cost the Treasury £1 billion a year, or does he welcome the Chancellor going back on his original scheme?

Mr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to his opinion, but I welcome the Chancellor's measures. Given the pre-Budget predictions by some pundits that all was gloom and doom for the British film industry, I am glad that step was taken.

I welcome the Chancellor's steady-as-she-goes Budget, which maintains investment in health, education and other public services, and I welcome the measures proposed on occupational pensions.

Rob Marris: From his long history of trade union activities, my hon. Friend will be well aware of the manufacturing sector, and he, like me, represents a west midlands constituency—a key manufacturing area. Certain measures in this year's Budget, as in last year's, assist manufacturing, although there is more to do. Will my hon. Friend say more about manufacturing, particularly in the west midlands, and ways in which the Budget will assist venture capital, research and development, and so on?

Mr. Cunningham: Research and development was underfunded in the past. When Rolls-Royce needed R and D aid, it was provided in the form of a loan—not a tax concession—that created many difficulties. Research and development also keeps universities on their toes. The universities of Warwick and Coventry are among many that undertake R and D for companies. R and D support also brings comfort to small employers with 10 to 20 staff, who have families and mortgages to pay and who want to sustain the standard of living that they have achieved through steady employment.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Before the hon. Gentleman took the intervention, he mentioned the impact that the Budget would have on pensions. Can he see any impact that the Budget measures will have on the Government's declared target to have 60 per cent. of pensions fully funded by 2050?

Mr. Cunningham: I would not like to make any forecasts on the basis of that sort of question.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not said anything about the £28 billion savings gap. Can he explain what the Budget does to close it?

Mr. Cunningham: We are all aware of the £28 billion savings gap, and the Chancellor certainly looked at that when he considered the tax situation. Many companies, particularly public utilities, were not reinvesting in their industries; they were taking the profits. They were encouraged to reinvest, and the hon. Gentleman can get an independent report on that issue from the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cunningham: I will give way for the last time, but I must then move on.

Mr. Bercow: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Given his long-standing interest in the manufacturing sector and the extreme importance that all of us should attach to small and medium-sized enterprises within that sector, will he tell the House what assessment he has made of the Regulatory Flexibility Act 1980 and the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act 1996 in the United States?

Mr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman can do his own analysis of that; I am certainly not going to.

I welcome the Budget. It should be supported as it covers many of our concerns.

6.16 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I must begin with a tribute to the hon. Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham). He held the House magnificently for longer than one might have supposed.

This has been a most interesting debate, but I shall restrict myself to commenting on the speeches of Conservative Members. No doubt the Chief Secretary will comment on those made by Labour Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) illustrated brilliantly the impossibility of making administrative savings on a serious scale in the Department for Work and Pensions without simplifying the welfare system. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) identified with his customary clarity and mastery the key issue raised by the Budget—namely Labour's third-term tax rises. [Interruption.] The Chancellor correctly identifies himself as the cause of that and enters the Chamber at the right moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), from his lofty position as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, told the House about the horror stories of wasted money and made enormously valuable suggestions about how to reduce that waste. My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) exposed with extreme lucidity the deficiencies of the Government's well-intentioned but misguided policies on poverty. My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) surprised the House, because he made clear the remarkable fact that, although official borrowing this year is £37.5 billion, the Government are actually programmed to borrow £44 billion of cash. I owe him a profound debt for pointing that out. My hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) accurately pinpointed the causes why so much money has been wasted.

Today and on previous days, the Chancellor's Budget has been described as very political and very clever. It was certainly very political. Indeed, so far as I am aware, it is the first time in recent memory that the Chancellor has used his Budget speech almost entirely to respond to a speech by the shadow Chancellor. Perhaps further historical research in the Treasury will show that it was the most political Budget for more than 200 years. I doubt whether, in a few months' time, it will look very clever.

Andy Burnham: The right hon. Gentleman began by commending his colleague the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who, I believe, began the debate by saying that the right hon. Gentleman had not made any specific statements on the defence budget but that the Opposition were committed overall to ensuring the efficient delivery of public services. That is how the hon. Gentleman began. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, only a few weeks ago, he said:

"I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues that the baseline for spending"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should be brief.

Andy Burnham: The right hon. Gentleman said that the "baseline spending across all of these departmental"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Letwin.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I wish that the hon. Gentleman had finishing reading that out. I did indeed say that, and I went on to say something else. If he had been in the Chamber during the debate, he would have heard this being read out, too:

"I recognise, moreover, that there will inevitably be cases in which particular programmes, or even the expenditure of whole departments, will need to rise at a rate faster than this. To fund such increases beyond the baseline, specific savings against the baseline will need to be found elsewhere within the non-NHS and non-schools departmental expenditure limits."

I do not know whether he has had the experience in his household budget of having to save money somewhere to spend it on something else. Believe me, if the Chancellor is re-elected, he will have that experience after taxes have gone up.

The Budget was founded on a startling admission. For the first time in new Labour's brief and so far, I fear, rather inglorious history, the Chancellor admitted that he and his colleagues have been happily wasting £20 billion a year of people's money. In 1998, he said that he was "determined to get value for every penny we spend".

He now tells us that 2 trillion of the pennies that he has been spending each year are valueless. In 2001, the Prime Minister told The Guardian that it was impossible to save that sort of money without taking it out of the schools and hospital programme. Will the Chancellor tell us whether the Prime Minister was wrong then or whether he himself is wrong now? [Interruption.] I thought that he might not, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Rob Marris: I venture to suggest that I might be able to help the right hon. Gentleman on that point. The Chancellor made it clear in his Budget that the savings from moving staff from the back office to the front office would come because of the Government's investment in information technology. That investment had not been made in 2001, and it had not been put in place by the Conservatives in 1997; that is the situation that we inherited.

Mr. Letwin: I hope desperately that the hon. Gentleman will be given a job because he certainly will not get one as a spin doctor. I assure him that the Chancellor's purported savings have nothing to do with investment.

Parts of the Chancellor's savings are meant to come from cutting the civil service by 40,000 between now and 2008. I understand that the Chancellor's spin doctors—not the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), but his genuine spin doctors—have been busy explaining that it was with that very reduction in mind that he increased civil service numbers by 52,361 over the past four years. That sounds enormously clever, does it not? One increases the civil service by 50,000 precisely so that one can reduce it by 40,000. If Labour Members have difficulty identifying the logic behind the strategy, or even if there are hesitations in some quarters about the reduction in civil service numbers, let me reassure them. They do not need to worry because under a Labour Government, there may well be no net reduction whatsoever in civil service numbers.

The Chancellor intends to remove 40,000 from the civil service between now and 2008, but at the present rate of hiring the Government, if re-elected, will add 65,450 civil servants over the same period. The Chancellor's policy on the civil service is admirably clear. His aim is to hire people in order to sack them, just as long as he hires a few more than he sacks. I hope that his spin doctors will have a fine time explaining that proposition over the coming months. [HON. MEMBERS: "Balls!"] Let us not worry about who, or what, the name may be.

The Chancellor's cleverness is not, of course, meant to reside only in the brilliance of his plans for the civil service. It is also meant to be demonstrated by his new-found attachment to 2.5 per cent. per year efficiency savings throughout the public sector. The savings certainly cannot come from reducing numbers of public sector employees, because the Gershon report states clearly that the number of people employed in the public sector as a whole is meant to rise by 300,000 during the next few years. The efficiency savings, which the Chancellor said in 1998 would not be needed and the Prime Minister said in 2001 could not be achieved, will be brought about by adding more than 300,000 new public sector workers. I have to admit that if that can be done, it is very clever indeed. I doubt that a combination of Newton and Einstein could match it for cleverness.

Mr. Watson: There is no point in the right hon. Gentleman spluttering out his speech while he is surrounded by his laughing boys. Will he confirm that he intends to freeze in real terms the defence budget and the law and order budget for the United Kingdom? If not, where are the rest of the cuts going to come from?

Mr. Letwin: Oh dear, I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has been in the Chamber. I thought that he was, but it may have been a shadow of him. A moment ago, I read a passage that made it perfectly clear that I have made no such commitment and have no intention of doing so.

I fear that the nation will not gain much from efficiencies that never take place, and in which neither the Prime Minister nor the Chancellor had the slightest belief or interest until the Opposition pointed out the colossal and shameful waste that is currently taking place. However, I remind my hon. Friends that there is one large advantage in the Chancellor's admission that he is wasting £20 billion a year and in his new-found belief that he can make 2.5 per cent. efficiency savings a year. If there is waste on that scale and if efficiencies of 2.5 per cent. a year are possible, a Conservative Government who believe in cutting waste could do so without affecting front-line services.

James Purnell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, the hon. Gentleman should listen so that he understands a bit of the logic even if his hon. Friends cannot.

A Conservative Government who plan a gross recruitment freeze to cut the civil service by 100,000 with genuine net reductions rather than fiddled figures, and who are not shackled by a commitment to increase the public sector by more than 300,000, can truly make the savings that the Chancellor just wants to talk about. By the logic of the Chancellor's own admission, a Conservative Government can do so without touching front-line services. I do not want to stretch the arithmetical capacities of Government Members, but they will surely see that if a departmental budget of £100 is possible this year, and there is inflation of 2.5 per cent. and offsetting efficiency savings of 2.5 per cent., it is possible to have a departmental budget next year of £100 without a real-terms cut in front-line services. The Treasury Bench have not yet realised that, but by allowing himself to be trapped into admitting £20 billion a year of waste and by allowing himself to admit the potential for 2.5 per cent. efficiency savings a year, the Chancellor has removed completely any slight credibility from his much loved attack on so-called Conservative cuts. If a 2.5 per cent. a year efficiency saving is possible, a cash freeze with no real-terms cuts whatsoever in front-line services is possible.

Once people begin to accept the force of that argument they will stop thinking that the Chancellor's Budget was so very clever, but will not stop thinking it was political. It was very political in every sense. It was political because it was aimed solely at scoring a short-term political point; it contained no measures whatsoever to deal with the massive and growing economic imbalances to which the Chancellor's misguided policies have given rise.

[Mr. Letwin]

I want to do something unusual and pay tribute to our friends on the Liberal Benches, who rightly alluded to those economic imbalances—[Interruption.] My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition says, "Steady", but I pay tribute where it is due. I wish that I could pay tribute to the Chancellor's measures to address those imbalances in the Budget, but I cannot. There was nothing to tackle the problem of household indebtedness, which now stands at almost £1 trillion. There was nothing to tackle the problem of the decline in savings—the savings ratio has halved, and the Chancellor proposes to do nothing whatsoever about it. There was nothing to tackle the problem of productivity—the productivity growth rate has halved, and the Chancellor proposes to do nothing whatsoever about it. Most of all, however, the Budget was political because it aimed to hide the Chancellor's rising taxes from the British public.

The Budget provides for the nation's tax bill to rise by almost 8 per cent. next year, and again by almost 8 per cent. the year after. That is what the Chancellor, in a resort to the definitions of the economists, called "fiscal neutrality", but I doubt that the families and businesses who are paying that 8 per cent. increase in tax will regard it as neutral. The Budget locks in huge increases in the burden of tax under Labour. Taxes have increased by £5,000 per household per year since 1997. The Red Book now projects a tax burden in 2008—I hope that my hon. Friends will go to the country and tell people this—that will be the highest for a quarter of a century. Almost no one except the Chancellor himself doubts that tax rates need to rise to fill the Treasury's coffers in the way that his plans demand.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): I have been listening carefully to the right hon. Gentleman. Is he aware that the director general of the CBI said that he commends the Chancellor on producing a Budget that protects economic stability and curbs waste?

Mr. Letwin: The director general of the CBI correctly points out that the Chancellor did no damage in a Budget that did nothing at all about business. It is the first time in many years that that can be said. Unfortunately, however, the tax rises that the Budget augurs will be tax rises for businesses as much as for everybody else. They have been to date and they will be again.

James Purnell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I will not give way again.

Almost no one except the Chancellor doubts that there will be tax rises if Labour is re-elected. It took just 24 hours for the Institute for Fiscal Studies to calculate that the Budget sets us on course for Labour's third-term tax rises, and that only Conservative plans would avoid those tax rises. It took just 72 hours for the Ernst and Young ITEM Club to confirm that this is a borrow now, tax later Budget.

The Chancellor, who prides himself on his forecasts with huge self-confidence, has miscalculated his own borrowing on six successive occasions over three years. He is now predicting borrowing of more than £140 billion over the next five years, despite the fact that he is predicting economic growth at or above trend in each of those years. He knows as well as the rest of us, as well as the Institute for Fiscal Studies and as well as the ITEM Club, that if he borrows that much on the nation's credit card, he will have to raise taxes.

The Chancellor's plan is clear. Up to the election he proceeds entirely by stealth. There are, in fact, six extra stealth taxes in the Budget—the new small business tax, the new company vans tax, the new tax on trusts, the new tax on red diesel and the new tax on other road fuels. That brings the number of stealth taxes to 66. We have before us the clickety-click Chancellor. After the election, if Labour wins, it will all be different. The layers of stealth technology will be swept away in one glorious efficiency saving. The new taxes will be there for all of us to see—£10 billion or £15 billion a year of them, to judge by the independent forecasts, gleaming new taxes that families and businesses will be called upon to pay as a tribute to the Chancellor's great cleverness. Perhaps if the people of this country see that happening to them, they will indeed think it clever, but I suspect it is more likely that they will think it too clever by half.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): This has been a good debate, during which a range of varied opinions has been expressed in all parts of the House, as one would expect. Over the different days of the debate, Members across the House have reflected a range of specific interests and areas of expertise.

There is one issue that I wish to deal with at the outset. I know it is a matter of concern to hon. Members in all parts of the House because they have raised it with me—the issue of whisky, alcohol and tax stamps. Whisky and alcohol are matters of interest in all parts of the House, but tax stamps are a serious matter. I undertake to reply in person to all those who raised specific issues relating to tax stamps, and to pass their views on to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, who I know takes these matters very seriously.

Angus Robertson: Scotland's First Minister Jack McConnell is well known for following the orders of London Labour. Is he right to say that he was disappointed by the Chancellor's announcement on strip stamps?

Mr. Boateng: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman makes such an overtly party political point. He knows that the Government have sought at every stage to involve the industry and that we have set aside some £3 million in a fund for assistance with capital investment targeted at the smallest firms, in order to cover up-front costs. Of course there is a range of opinions about tax stamps and we seek to respond and take them on board, as is appropriate.

Mr. O'Neill: I wonder whether my right hon. Friend can help us. It is not that long ago since he rejected proposals for strip stamps, but he has now changed his mind. What is the reason for this Damascene conversion?

Mr. Boateng: We had to take into account the findings of the Roques committee and the evidence of increasing fraud and evasion. Of course I respect the views of my hon. Friend and others on both sides of the House who have genuine concerns about this issue. However, I should point out that by 2005–06, as a result of the duty freeze announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, the tax on a standard bottle of spirits will be 36p a bottle lower in real terms than now, and £1.33 lower in real terms than if the duty had risen in line with expected inflation since 1997. That is a record that the Conservatives never matched when they were in government.

I shall move on to the main substance of the Budget, and I would like to address a number of the concerns raised by my right hon. and hon. Friends. First, however, let me make a passing reference to some of the points made by Opposition Members. It would be true to say that they set a number of hares running. It would also be true to say that they sought to revive some dead foxes. To say that they added anything to the substance of today's debate, however, would be false. They said absolutely nothing of value about the real issues confronting the British people.

That brings to mind the record of the Conservatives when they were in government. The Leader of the Opposition was Employment Secretary when unemployment doubled—[Interruption.] He laughs. The Conservatives do not like to hear about their own record. He was Environment Secretary when the poll tax was introduced. And who was the man who dreamed up the poll tax in his eyrie at No. 10? It was the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the shadow Chancellor. That is the Conservatives' record.

The fact is that the Tory Front Bench has not changed since those days. The personalities have not changed; they have just got bigger, one way or another, and so have their mistakes. There is a real difference between them and us, and this Budget demonstrates that fact. Only a Labour Government are capable of taking the hard decisions, the right decisions, on the economy and public services. Only this Government are up to the challenge of building on our hard-won record of economic stability and our enviable record of growth. That is the difference between them and us. Only this Government are going to do what we have to do to secure and maintain the stability and growth of the economy, and to invest in the education, skills, science and innovation that will drive the growth and prosperity of our nation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) was right to raise Cornwall's interests. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) was right to raise the issue of science and innovation. Only this party can be guaranteed to invest in those areas, and to meet the needs of the people of Cornwall.

James Purnell: On that point about science and innovation, did my right hon. Friend hear the shadow Chancellor say that he was going to cut by more than zero per cent.—[Interruption.] He is going to cut in cash terms all budgets other than those in schools and hospitals. Those cuts could involve science, home affairs or defence.

Mr. Boateng: We will come in due course to analyse the pledges made by the shadow Chancellor.

Only the Labour party in government can be relied on to invest in our vital health service, our housing and transport infrastructure. That was the very point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) when she spoke movingly of the housing needs of her constituents and the need to make sure that we invest in the economy of Stoke-on-Trent. In an uncertain world, we must also invest in law and order, security and defence, to protect our citizens at home and our interests abroad. And we must meet our global responsibilities to others by investing in international development and the achievement of the millennium development goals. In that regard, I think particularly of my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) and his distinguished record on matters related to overseas development.

Not only could the Conservative party not deliver the economic stability to match our investments: it does not even have the desire to do so. It is a party driven by commitment to cuts in public services and lower investment as a matter of blind dogma—[Interruption.] I was not listening, and I will tell the House what to.

Last month, the shadow Chancellor announced a two-year cash freeze in spending—he can deny it at any time. That is a 5 per cent. real terms cut in 2005–06 and 2006–07, with immediate implementation of £18 billion worth of real terms cuts. There was much gnashing of teeth by his disgruntled colleagues, and much wringing of hands, but the policy of the shadow Chancellor and his party is clear—to cut investment at the very time in the economic cycle when it is right to invest, and yet to continue to make spending pledges that simply cannot be funded. In that, they share a great deal with the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Cameron: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Boateng: Not at the moment.

That, of course, left the shadow Chancellor's shadow Cabinet colleagues in a state of abject disarray.

Mr. Cameron: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Boateng: I was hoping that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who sits strangely silent in front of the hon. Gentleman, would defend those cuts at this stage. Apparently not, however, so I will give way to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. Cameron: If inflation is at 2.5 per cent., and efficiency gains are at 2.5 per cent., how can a freeze be a cut?

Mr. Boateng: Well, the hon. Gentleman should tell that—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will. What the Conservatives have promised is a cash cut. That is why the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), who, sadly, is not in his place, said of that cut:

"It is outrageous. You cannot possibly go into an election with this pledge".

The shadow International Development Secretary, the hon. Member for Buckingham, said:

"If we are to be taken seriously as a party of government which cares about the most vulnerable people on the planet, there has to be a public spending commitment."

I see that he is nodding. But the promise is not a commitment; it is a cut.

Rob Marris: Will my right hon. Friend note that the mathematics of the shadow Chancellor and the hon. Member for Witney, who taunted Labour Members for their mathematics, are faulty? If we have growth from 100—to use the figure used by the shadow Chancellor—with inflation, to 102.5, and we then cut that by 2.5 per cent., we will end up with a figure of less than 100. That is a cut, and that is the mathematics.

Mr. Boateng: Well, the reality is that it is all down in black—

Mr. Letwin: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: Of course.

Mr. Letwin: I am delighted that the Chief Secretary has given way. Will he return to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), which is very simple? Given that the Chancellor believes that efficiency cuts amounting to 2½ per cent. are being made, how can a freeze of a departmental budget at 100 conceivably constitute a real-terms cut in front-line services? The Chief Secretary has to answer that, because the Chancellor has made him answer it.

Mr. Boateng: What the right hon. Gentleman has offered is a cash freeze. This is what he said:

"I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues that the baseline for spending across all of these departmental budgets will be 0 per cent. growth for the first two years.

I fully accept that holding programme spending within departmental expenditure limits other than the NHS and schools to a zero increase for the first two years and to what amounts to a zero real terms increase thereafter is a tough constraint."

You bet it is a tough constraint. That is why they were squealing and whining when they heard about it.

Mr. Letwin: I am most grateful to the Chief Secretary for giving way again. It is a tough constraint. The Chancellor said that he had tough choices to make; so have we. We can have his tax rises, or our constraint. Will the Chief Secretary answer the question? If you have 2½ per cent. efficiency and 2½ per cent. inflation, do you or do you not have to make real-terms cuts in front-line services? Yes or no?

Mr. Boateng: Let the right hon. Member tell that to the shadow Secretaries of State for Defence, International Development and Transport. Or let us return to the quotation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear the Minister. It is no fault of his; there is a lot of shouting.

Mr. Boateng: What the Conservatives would do is freeze expenditure—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): In each of their Departments.

Mr. Boateng: In each of their Departments. If that is not what the Conservatives are going to do, let the right hon. Gentleman say so. Answer comes there none. This Labour Government—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear the Chief Secretary. The Chief Secretary is addressing the Chair.

Mr. Boateng: In contrast, this Labour Government are in a position to invest more, not less, and they will do so in areas that will enable the United Kingdom to grow and prosper in the global economy of the future. In this Budget the Government reject the approach of our political opponents, who, faced with tough choices, have consistently shirked them. Let me take them through those choices. The right hon. Gentleman can rise and protest if I misrepresent his position.

We recognise that international terrorism puts additional pressures on law and order, so to keep the country safe and secure the Government are making real-terms increases in spending on our police and other forms of security at home. Will the right hon. Gentleman do likewise? That is the answer that the British people will be waiting for, and the answer that they will note. In contrast, our party has seen the provision of an additional 11,000 police officers. If the Conservatives had their way they would impose cuts amounting to £669 million, the equivalent of 13,000 police officers—and theirs is the party under which crime doubled. There is no commitment from the Opposition to increase expenditure on the police or on all the priorities that are those of the British people.

Let us consider defence. That will give the Opposition another opportunity to clarify their position. We recognise the pressures that are caused by commitments in Kosovo, Afghanistan and Iraq and in the wider fight against terrorism. We will not leave our troops ill equipped or unsupported and we have therefore allocated real-terms increases in defence spending. Will the Opposition do likewise? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] We are entitled to know the Conservative defence policy. Opposition Members would freeze spending on defence and that would amount to cuts of £1.5 billion by 2008—the equivalent of 40,000 personnel. If that is not true, let them now say so. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]

Furthermore, the Government intend to sustain real-terms increases in spending on international development while the Opposition advocate a spending freeze. [Interruption.] One Conservative Front-Bench Member says, "Absolutely" and another says, "No." Such a freeze would mean a real-terms cut of £229 million in the first two years—the equivalent of eliminating the United Kingdom's programmes for Sudan, Sierra Leone and Ethiopia. If that is not true, let Conservative Members now say so. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]

At the heart of this year's Budget, as enunciated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, was the announcement of resources for education, skills, science and technology. They are vital for business, as the CBI recognised, and will drive our future prosperity. It is imperative that we invest in them now. That is why my right hon. Friend announced an extra £8.5 billion for UK education in 2007–08 compared with 2005–06—an average annual increase of 4.4 per cent. across the 2004 spending review period. Are the Opposition prepared to match that?

The reality is that, in contrast to the spending freeze that the Opposition propose, we intend to ensure that we maintain progress in education and children's services. We intend to spend approximately £900 million on children's services. If the Opposition had their way, there would be £900 million of cuts. That would mean 36,000 fewer social workers working with the most vulnerable children. That would be the result of their spending plans.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is cruelly taunting the Opposition, which is highly enjoyable. Perhaps one figure could succour them. How many years does my right hon. Friend believe that it will take for the electorate to forget the Conservative party's record of sheer economic incompetence?

Mr. Boateng: They will never forget it and we will never allow them to forget it.

I want to give the Opposition the opportunity to explain the patient's passport. We have heard many different stories about what it is. What is their commitment? Is it, as we believe, to subsidise private medicine? Does not the patient's passport, as the Opposition describe it, mean taking money out of the NHS and giving it to BUPA? They would prefer one extra patient to be treated by BUPA than tens of thousands of patients to be treated by the NHS.

What exactly is the pupil's passport? On 22 February, the shadow Chancellor said that the pupil's passport could be topped up and used for cheap private schools—St. Trinian's and St. Cuthbert's rather than Eton and Roedean. On 6 March, the Conservative website confirmed that but on 7 March, it claimed that the statement on 6 March was an error and that parents could not top up the pupil's passport. Is the pupils passport on or off? What is the Conservatives' policy on education? The truth is that they simply have not yet worked it out. On health, employment and welfare—

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As the Chief Secretary seems to be getting a bit lost in this political diatribe, may I remind him that he is about to embark on what will be the most difficult public spending round that the Government have faced since they came to office, because they are seeking to slow the growth of public spending. When one of his colleagues tells him that a particular service needs 2.5 per cent. growth, will he tell him that that can be achieved by 2.5 per cent. efficiency savings with no increase in the cash settlement?

Mr. Boateng: Of course I would because we have made it clear where our priorities are. They are on education.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm that, even at this stage of the debate, you are allowed to call a different Member on the Government Front Bench to speak? The Chancellor is constantly prompting the Chief Secretary, who is obviously completely lost. Can you call the Chancellor instead, so that we can get a proper version of the Government's policies instead of a second-hand one?

Mr. Speaker: Chancellors are entitled to prod—[Interruption.] Order. I would not dream of stopping the Chancellor from doing that.

Mr. Boateng: It is called teamwork. When we listen to the dissonant voices of right hon. and hon. Members in the Opposition, we realise that, until they start to act like a team, they will never be fit for Government.

The reality is, as the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions outlined, that the Budget delivers proposals to tackle unemployment and inactivity. It builds on the success of the new deal, which has already enabled 1 million people to get back into work since 1997. What is the proposal of Conservative Members in relation to the new deal? It is to scrap it. It is to fly in the face of the reality of their constituents and our constituents who have been helped back into gainful employment as a result of the new deal. When the Conservatives last had stewardship of the economy, unemployment topped 3 million. We have created 1.7 million new jobs and we continue to create new jobs. That is good news. That is the difference between them—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Bercow, I have told you before about getting too excited. I will not allow it.

Mr. Boateng: That is the difference between the Conservatives and us. We care about jobs. We care about people. We are delivering to people. We are delivering jobs. Business recognises that it is Labour that works and it will be a disaster were the Tories ever again to get stewardship of the economy. To support our spending plans, the public sector will be seeking—we are entitled to expect it and we will deliver it—value for money to maximise efficiency and to minimise waste.

The choice is clear. In the Budget statement, the Chancellor explained how our hard-won economic stability and sustained growth allow the Government to commit more investment in the areas that matter to the country, not less, as the Conservative party would have it. The dividing lines between the Conservatives and us are clear. The choice of two futures for Britain is plain: sustained economic stability, or a return to boom and bust, stop and go and deep recession; investment and reform in health, education, transport and tackling crime, or cuts, charges and privatisation; expansion of the new deal, or its abolition; investment in science, or a failure to invest in science. We condemn the cuts and commend the Budget.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.

MR. SPEAKER then, pursuant to Standing Order No. 51(3) (Ways and Means Motions), put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of the further motions

2. RATES OF TOBACCO PRODUCTS DUTY

Resolved,

That—

(1) For the Table of rates of duty in Schedule 1 to the Tobacco Products Duty Act 1979 there shall be substituted—

Question accordingly agreed to.

19. VALUE ADDED TAX (GAS AND ELECTRICITY SUPPLIED BY PERSONS OUTSIDE UK)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of value added tax about gas and electricity supplied by persons outside the United Kingdom.

20. VALUE ADDED TAX (PRIVATE USE OF STOCK IN TRADE CARS BY EMPLOYEES ETC)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of value added tax in relation to a supply which is a supply of services by virtue of paragraph 5(4) of Schedule 4 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 where—

(a) the goods in question consist of a motor car,

(b) the person making the supply is a motor dealer or motor manufacturer,

(c) the supply is for a consideration, and

(d) the value of the supply for the purposes of value added tax is less than its open market value.

21. INCOME TAX (CHARGE AND RATES FOR 2004–05)

Resolved,

That income tax shall be charged for the year 2004–05, and for that year—

(a) the starting rate shall be 10%;

(b) the basic rate shall be 22%;

(c) the higher rate shall be 40%.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

22. INCOME TAX (PERSONAL ALLOWANCES FOR THOSE AGED 65 OR MORE)

Resolved,

That—

(1) For the year 2004–05—

(a) the amount specified in section 257(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall be £6,830; and

(b) the amount specified in section 257(3) of that Act shall be £6,950.

(2) Accordingly, section 257C(1) of that Act, so far as it relates to the amounts so specified, shall not apply for that year.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

23. CORPORATION TAX (CHARGE AND RATE FOR 2005)

Motion made, and Question put,

That corporation tax shall be charged for the financial year 2005 at the rate of 30%.

Question accordingly agreed to.

27. Special rates of tax applicable to trusts

Resolved,

That in relation to the year 2004–05 and any subsequent year of assessment for which income tax is charged—

(a) the Schedule F trust rate shall be 32.5 per cent, and

(b) the rate applicable to trusts shall be 40 per cent.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

28. Sums paid to settlor otherwise than as income

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 677 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

29. Provision not at arm's length

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Schedule 28AA to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

30. Company distributions (payments of excessive interest etc)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the repeal of section 209(2)(da) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

31. Investment companies and companies with investment business

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of corporation tax in relation to companies which are or have been—

(a) investment companies, as defined in section 130 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, or

(b) companies whose business consists wholly or partly in the making of investments.

32. Insurance companies

Resolved,

That provision may be made about insurance companies and companies which have ceased to be insurance companies after a transfer of business.

33. Loan relationships etc

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made for the purposes of corporation tax in relation to—

(a) loan relationships; and

(b) other relationships where a company stands, or is treated as standing, in the position of a creditor or debtor in relation to a debt.

34. Derivative contracts

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in relation to derivative contracts for the purposes of corporation tax.

35. Accounting practice

Resolved,

That provision may be made as to the meaning of generally accepted accounting practice and otherwise amending provisions of the Tax Acts that operate by reference to accounting practice.

36. Construction industry scheme

Motion made, and Question put,

That provision may be made in relation to sub-contractors in the construction industry.

Question accordingly agreed to.

64. STAMP DUTY LAND TAX (MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003 shall be amended in accordance with the following provisions of this Resolution.

(2) In section 43—

(a) in paragraph (c) of subsection (3), after "interest" there shall be inserted "(other than a lease)";

(b) after that paragraph there shall be inserted—

"(d) the variation of a lease is an acquisition and disposal of a chargeable interest only where it takes effect, or is treated for the purposes of this Part, as the grant of a new lease.".

(3) After subsection (9) of section 44 there shall be inserted—

"(9A) Where—

(a) paragraph 12A of Schedule 17A applies (agreement for lease), or

(b) paragraph 19(3) to (6) of Schedule 17A applies (missives of let in Scotland), it applies in place of subsections (4), (8) and (9).".

(4) After that section there shall be inserted—

"44A Contract providing for conveyance to third party

(1) This section applies where a contract is entered into under which a chargeable interest is to be conveyed by one party to the contract (A) at the direction or request of the other (B)—

(a) to a person (C) who is not a party to the contract, or

(b) either to such a person or to B.

(2) B is not regarded as entering into a land transaction by reason of entering into the contract, but the following provisions have effect.

(3) If the contract is substantially performed B is treated for the purposes of this Part as acquiring a chargeable interest, and accordingly as entering into a land transaction.

The effective date of the transaction is when the contract is substantially performed.

(4) Where the contract is (to any extent) afterwards rescinded or annulled, or is for any other reason not carried into effect, the tax paid by virtue of subsection (3) shall (to that extent) be repaid by the Inland Revenue.

Repayment must be claimed by amendment of the land transaction return made in respect of the contract.

(5) Subject to subsection (6), section 44 (contract and conveyance) does not apply (except so far as it defines "substantial performance") in relation to the contract.

(6) Where—

(a) this section applies by virtue of subsection (1)(b), and

(b) by reason of B's direction or request, A becomes obliged to convey a chargeable interest to B, section 44 applies to that obligation as it applies to a contract for a land transaction that is to be completed by a conveyance.

(7) Section 44 applies in relation to any contract between B and C, in respect of the chargeable interest referred to in subsection (1) above, that is to be completed by a conveyance.

References to completion in that section, as it so applies, include references to conveyance by A to C of the subject matter of the contract between B and C.

(8) In this section "contract" includes any agreement and "conveyance" includes any instrument.".

(5) In section 45—

(a) after paragraph (b) of subsection (1) there shall be inserted ", and

(c) paragraph 12B of Schedule 17A (assignment of agreement for lease) does not apply.";

(b) at the end of that subsection there shall be inserted ", and references to the transferor and the transferee shall be read accordingly.";

(c) for subsection (5) there shall be substituted—

"(5) Where a transfer of rights relates to part only of the subject-matter of the original contract ("the relevant part")—

(a) subsection (8)(b) of section 44 (restriction of charge to tax on subsequent conveyance) has effect as if the reference to the amount of tax chargeable on that contract were a reference to an appropriate proportion of that amount, and

(b) a reference in the second sentence of subsection (3) above to the original contract, or a reference in subsection (4) above to the secondary contract arising from an earlier transfer of rights, is to that contract so far as relating to the relevant part (and that contract so far as not relating to the relevant part shall be treated as a separate contract).";

(d) after that subsection there shall be inserted—

"(5A) In relation to a land transaction treated as taking place by virtue of subsection (3)—

(a) references in Schedule 7 (group relief) to the vendor shall be read as references to the vendor under the original contract;

(b) other references in this Part to the vendor shall be read, where the context permits, as referring to either the vendor under the original contract or the transferor.".

(6) After section 45 there shall be inserted—

"45A Contract providing for conveyance to third party: effect of transfer of rights

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a contract ("the original contract") is entered into under which a chargeable interest is to be conveyed by one party to the contract (A) at the direction or request of the other (B)—

(i) to a person (C) who is not a party to the contract, or

(ii) either to such a person or to B,

and

(b) there is an assignment or other transaction (relating to the whole or part of the subject-matter of the original contract) as a result of which a person (D) becomes entitled to exercise any of B's rights under the original contract in place of B.

References in the following provisions of this section to a transfer of rights are to any such assignment or other transaction.

(2) D is not regarded as entering into a land transaction by reason of the transfer of rights, but section 44A (contract providing for conveyance to third party) has effect in accordance with the following provisions of this section.

(3) That section applies as if—

(a) D had entered into a contract (a "secondary contract") in the same terms as the original contract except with D as a party instead of B, and

(b) the consideration due from D under the secondary contract were—

(i) so much of the consideration under the original contract as is referable to the subject-matter of the transfer of rights and is to be given (directly or indirectly) by D or a person connected with him, and

(ii) the consideration given for the transfer of rights.

(4) The substantial performance of the original contract shall be disregarded if—

(a) it occurs at the same time as, and in connection with, the substantial performance of the secondary contract, or

(b) it occurs after the transfer of rights.

(5) Where there are successive transfers of rights, subsection (3) has effect in relation to each of them.

(6) The substantial performance of the secondary contract arising from an earlier transfer of rights shall be disregarded if—

(a) it occurs at the same time as, and in connection with, the substantial performance of the secondary contract arising from a subsequent transfer of rights, or

(b) it occurs after that subsequent transfer.

(7) Where a transfer of rights relates to only part of the subject matter of the original contract, or to only some of the rights under that contract—

(a) a reference in subsection (3)(a) or (4) to the original contract, or a reference in subsection (6) to the secondary contract arising from an earlier transfer, is to that contract so far as relating to that part or those rights, and

(b) that contract so far as not relating to that part or those rights shall be treated as a separate contract.

(8) The effective date of a land transaction treated as entered into by virtue of subsection (3) is not earlier than the date of the transfer of rights.

(9) In relation to a such a transaction—

(a) references in Schedule 7 (group relief) to the vendor shall be read as references to A;

(b) other references in this Part to the vendor shall be read, where the context permits, as referring to either A or B.

(10) Section 839 of the Taxes Act 1988 (connected persons) applies for the purposes of subsection (3)(b).

(11) In this section "contract" includes any agreement.".

(7) After subsection (6) of section 48 there shall be inserted—

"(7) This section has effect subject to subsection (3) of section 44A (contract and conveyance to third party).".

(8) After subsection (4) of section 77 there shall be inserted—

"(5) A land transaction that a person is treated as entering into by virtue of subsection (3) of section 44A (contract and conveyance to third party) is notifiable.".

(9) In section 57A—

(a) for paragraph (b) of subsection (3) there shall be substituted—

"(aa) that the sale transaction is entered into wholly or partly in consideration of the leaseback transaction being entered into,

(b) that the only other consideration (if any) for the sale is the payment of money or the assumption, satisfaction or release of a debt (or both),";

(b) after paragraph (c) of that subsection there shall be inserted—

"(d) that the sale is not a transfer of rights within the meaning of section 45 (contract and conveyance: effect of transfer of rights) or 45A (contract providing for conveyance to third party: effect of transfer of rights), and

(e) where A and B are both bodies corporate at the effective date of the leaseback transaction, that they are not members of the same group for the purposes of group relief (see paragraph 1 of Schedule 7) at that date.";

(c) subsection (4) shall be omitted.

(10) In section 79(2), for the words from "other than" to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted "other than a transaction treated as taking place—

(a) under subsection (4) of section 44 (contract and conveyance) or under that section as it applies by virtue of section 45 (contract and conveyance: effect of transfer of rights), or

(b) under subsection (3) of section 44A (contract providing for conveyance to third party) or under that section as it applies by virtue of section 45A (contract providing for conveyance to third party: effect of transfer of rights).".

(11) In section 119(2)—

(a) after the entry for section 44(4) there shall be inserted—

"section 44A(3) (contract providing for conveyance to third party), section 45A(8) (contract providing for conveyance to third party: effect of transfer of rights),";

(b)at the end there shall be inserted—

"paragraph 12A(2) of Schedule 17A (agreement for lease followed by substantial performance), paragraph 12B(3) of that Schedule (assignment of agreement for lease occurring after agreement substantially performed), and paragraph 19(3) of that Schedule (missives of let in Scotland followed by substantial performance).".

(12) In section 122, in the entry for "vendor" there shall be inserted at the end "(see too sections 45(5A) and 45A(9))".

(13) In Schedule 4—

(a) after sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 10 there shall be inserted—

"(2A) Where subsection (8) of section 44 (contract and conveyance) applies, so that there are two notifiable transactions (the first being the contract and the second being the transaction effected on completion), the condition in sub-paragraph (2)(a) is treated as met in relation to the second transaction if it is met in relation to the first.";

(b) after sub-paragraph (4) of paragraph 17 there shall be inserted—

"(4A) Sub-paragraphs (3) and (4) shall be disregarded for the purposes of determining whether the land transaction in question is notifiable.".

(14) After paragraph 1 of Schedule 5 there shall be inserted—

"Amounts payable in respect of periods before grant of lease

1A For the purposes of this Part "rent" does not include any chargeable consideration for the grant of a lease that is payable in respect of a period before the grant of the lease."

(15) After paragraph 7 of Schedule 17A there shall be inserted—

"First rent review in final quarter of fifth year

7A Where—

(a) a lease contains provision under which the rent may be adjusted,

(b) under that provision the first (or only) such adjustment—

(i) is to an amount that (before the adjustment) is uncertain, and

(ii) has effect from a date (the "review date") that is expressed as falling five years after a specified date,

and

(c) the specified date falls within the three months before the beginning of the term of the lease, this Schedule has effect as if references to the first five years of the term of the lease were to the period beginning with the start of the term of the lease and ending with the review date.

References to the fifth year of the term of the lease shall be read accordingly.".

(16) In paragraph 9(1) of that Schedule, at the end of paragraph (b) there shall be inserted ", or

(c) a person claiming relief against re-entry or forfeiture as under-lessee in relation to the original sub-lease ("the old lease") is granted a lease ("the new lease") in pursuance of an order of a court.".

(17) After paragraph 12 of that Schedule there shall be inserted—

"Agreement for lease

12A(1) This paragraph applies where in England and Wales or Northern Ireland—

(a) an agreement for a lease is entered into, and

(b) the agreement is substantially performed without having been completed.

(2) The agreement is treated as if it were the grant of a lease in accordance with the agreement ("the notional lease"), beginning with the date of substantial performance.

The effective date of the transaction is that date.

(3) Where a lease is subsequently granted in pursuance of the agreement—

(a) the notional lease is treated as if it were surrendered at that time, and

(b) the lease itself is treated for the purposes of paragraph 9 (rent for overlap period in case of grant of further lease) as if it were granted in consideration of that surrender.

(4) Where sub-paragraph (1) applies and the agreement is (to any extent) afterwards rescinded or annulled, or is for any other reason not carried into effect, the tax paid by virtue of that sub-paragraph shall (to that extent) be repaid by the Inland Revenue.

Repayment must be claimed by amendment of the land transaction return made in respect of the agreement.

(5) In this paragraph "substantially performed" and "completed" have the same meanings as in section 44 (contract and conveyance).

Assignment of agreement for lease

12B (1) This paragraph applies, in place of section 45 (contract and conveyance: effect of transfer of rights) where in England and Wales or Northern Ireland a person assigns his interest as lessee under an agreement for a lease.

(2) If the assignment occurs without the agreement having been substantially performed, section 44 (contract and conveyance) has effect as if—

(a) the contract were with the assignee and not the assignor, and

(b) the consideration given by the assignee for entering into the contract included any consideration given by him for the assignment.

(3) If the assignment occurs after the agreement has been substantially performed—

(a) the assignment is a separate land transaction, and

(b) the effective date of that transaction is the date of the assignment.

(4) Where there are successive assignments, this paragraph has effect in relation to each of them.".

(18) At the end of paragraph 16 of that Schedule there shall be inserted—

"Paragraph 5 (exchanges) of Schedule 4 (chargeable consideration) does not apply in such a case.".

(19) For paragraph 19(2) of that Schedule there shall be substituted—

"(2) Where in Scotland there is a lease constituted by concluded missives of let ("the first lease") and at some later time a lease is executed ("the second lease")—

(a) the first lease is treated as if it were surrendered at that time, and

(b) the second lease is treated for the purposes of paragraph 9 (rent for overlap period in case of grant of further lease) as if it were granted in consideration of that surrender.

(3) Where in Scotland—

(a) there are concluded missives of let that do not constitute a lease, and

(b) the agreement represented by the missives of let is substantially performed without a lease having been executed, the missives of let are treated as if they did constitute a lease ("the notional lease").

The effective date of the transaction is when the agreement is substantially performed.

(4) Where sub-paragraph (3) applies and at some later time a lease is executed—

(a) the notional lease is treated as if it were surrendered at that time, and

(b) the lease itself is treated for the purposes of paragraph 9 as if it were granted in consideration of that surrender.

(5) References in sub-paragraphs (2) to (4) to the execution of a lease are to the execution of a lease that either—

(a) is in conformity with the missives of let, or

(b) relates to substantially the same property and period as the missives of let.

(6) Where subsection (3) applies and the agreement is (to any extent) afterwards rescinded or annulled, or is for any other reason not carried into effect, the tax paid by virtue of that sub-paragraph shall (to that extent) be repaid by the Inland Revenue.

Repayment must be claimed by amendment of the land transaction return made in respect of the agreement.".

(20) For paragraph 3(3)(c) of Schedule 19 there shall be substituted—

"(c) if on or after that date there is an assignment, subsale or other transaction (relating to the whole or part of the subject-matter of the contract) as a result of which a person other than the purchaser under the contract becomes entitled to call for a conveyance to him.".

(21) Paragraphs (4), (7) and (8) of this Resolution, and paragraphs (10) and (11) so far as relating to the section 44A inserted by paragraph (4), shall apply in relation to any contract entered into after 17th March 2004.

(22) Paragraphs (5), (6) and (12) of this Resolution, and paragraphs (10) and (11) so far as relating to the section 45A inserted by paragraph (6), shall apply in relation to any transfer of rights occurring after that date.

(23) Subject to paragraph (24) of this Resolution, the amendments made by the other provisions of this Resolution shall apply in relation to any transaction of which the effective date is after 17th March 2004.

(24) Paragraph (20) of this Resolution shall not apply in relation to a contract that was substantially performed before 17th March 2004.

(25) In this Resolution—

"effective date" and "substantially performed" have the same meaning as in Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003 (as amended by this Resolution);

"transfer of rights" has the same meaning as in section 45 of that Act or, as the case may require, section 45A of that Act (inserted by paragraph (6) of this Resolution).

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

65. STAMP DUTY LAND TAX (SHARED OWNERSHIP LEASES)

Resolved,

That—

(1) After paragraph 4 of Schedule 9 to the Finance Act 2003 there shall be inserted—

"Shared ownership lease: treatment of staircasing transaction

4A (1) This paragraph applies where under a shared ownership lease—

(a) the lessee or lessees have the right, on the payment of a sum, to require the terms of the lease to be altered so that the rent payable under it is reduced, and

(b) by exercising that right the lessee or lessees acquire an interest, additional to one already held, calculated by reference to the market value of the dwelling and expressed as a percentage of the dwelling or its value (a "share of the dwelling").

(2) Such an acquisition is exempt from charge if—

(a) an election was made for tax to be charged in accordance with paragraph 2 or, as the case may be, paragraph 4 and any tax chargeable in respect of the grant of the lease has been paid, or

(b) immediately after the acquisition the total share of the dwelling held by the lessee or lessees does not exceed 80%.

(3) In this paragraph "shared ownership lease" means a lease granted—

(a) by a qualifying body, or

(b) in pursuance of the preserved right to buy, in relation to which the conditions in paragraph 2(2) or 4(2) are met.

(4) Section 118 (meaning of "market value") does not apply in relation to the references in this paragraph to the market value of the dwelling.".

(2) In sub-paragraph (1) of paragraph 5 of that Schedule, for "2 and 4" there shall be substituted "2, 4 and 4A".

(3) In Schedule 19 to that Act, for sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 7 there shall be substituted—

"(2) In paragraph 3 of Schedule 9 (relief for transfer of reversion under shared ownership lease where election made for market value treatment) and paragraph 4A of that Schedule (shared ownership lease: treatment of staircasing transaction) as they apply in a case where the original lease was granted before the implementation date—

(a) a reference to a lease to which paragraph 2 of that Schedule applies shall be read as a reference to a lease to which section 97 of the Finance Act 1980 applied (which made provision for stamp duty corresponding to that paragraph), and

(b) a reference to an election having been made for tax to be charged in accordance with paragraph 2 or 4 of that Schedule shall be read as a reference to the lease having contained a statement of the parties' intention such as is mentioned in section 97(2)(d) of the Finance Act 1980 or, as the case may be, paragraph (d) of section 108(5) of the Finance Act 1981 (which made provision for stamp duty corresponding to paragraph 4).".

(4) The amendments made by paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Resolution shall apply in relation to an acquisition after 17th March 2004.

(5) Paragraph (3) of this Resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on 1st December 2003.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

66. PERIOD WITHIN WHICH CERTAIN CLAIMS MAY BE MADE

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made as to the period within which a claim may be made in respect of a mistake of law relating to a taxation matter under the care and management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

67. RELIEF FOR SHIPBUILDERS (ABOLITION)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made ending the availability of relief under section 2 of the Finance Act 1966.

68. RELIEF FROM TAX (INCIDENTAL AND CONSEQUENTIAL CHARGES)

Resolved,

That it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to any duty or tax (including charges having retrospective effect) that may arise from provisions designed in general to afford relief from taxation.

PROCEDURE (AMOUNTS DEDUCTED FROM PAYMENTS TO SUB-CONTRACTORS)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may include provision authorising sums—

(a) deducted from payments to or for sub-contractors in the construction industry, and

(b) paid to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, to be treated as paid in respect of, or on account of, liabilities of the sub-contractor other than liabilities in respect of income tax or corporation tax.

PROCEDURE (SAVINGS INCOME)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provision for implementing—

(a) Article 14 of Council Directive 2003/48/EC of 3rd June 2003 on taxation of savings income in the form of interest payments, or

(b) any corresponding provision of arrangements made in relation to a territory other than a member State.

PROCEDURE (MINIMUM CONTRIBUTIONS TO PERSONAL PENSION SCHEMES)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may make provision for the payment of sums out of the National Insurance Fund or the Northern Ireland National Insurance Fund in connection with provisions relating to the payment of minimum contributions under section 43 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993 or section 39 of the Pension Schemes (Northern Ireland) Act 1993.

PROCEDURE (MUTUAL ASSISTANCE IN CONNECTION WITH CUSTOMS UNION WITH ANDORRA)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may include provision to give effect to arrangements concerning mutual assistance made for the purposes of the Customs Union between the European Community and the Principality of Andorra.

PROCEDURE (FUTURE TAXATION)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain the following provisions taking effect in a future year—

(a) provision for corporation tax to be charged for the financial year 2005;

(b) provision about childcare or childcare vouchers provided for an employee;

(c) provision amending Parts 3 and 4 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 in relation to vans;

(d) provision about the enjoyment by an individual of property which is or represents property in which he previously owned an interest;

(e) provision about Lloyd's underwriters;

(f) provision in relation to pension schemes and similar schemes under which benefits are provided to or in respect of employees or former employees.

FINANCE (MONEY)

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act of the present Session relating to finance ("the Act"), it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the deduction of sums from the gross revenues of the department of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the purpose of paying amounts in the implementation of—

(i) Article 14 of Council Directive 2003/48/EC of 3rd June 2003 on taxation of savings income in the form of interest payments, or

(ii) any corresponding provision of arrangements made in relation to a territory other than a member State;

(b) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums paid out of the National Insurance Fund and the Northern Ireland National Insurance Fund under the Pension Schemes Act 1993 and the Pension Schemes (Northern Ireland) Act 1993;

(c) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of sums required by the Treasury and the Director of Savings to meet expenditure incurred with a view to securing—

(i) that the Treasury would be able to exercise their functions under sections 12 to 20A of (and Schedule 5A to) the National Loans Act 1968, and if the United Kingdom were to adopt the single currency in accordance with the Treaty establishing the European Communities.

(ii) that the Director of Savings would be able to exercise his functions,

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Blunkett, Mr. Secretary Reid, Mr. Secretary Smith, Ms Secretary Hewitt, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Mr. Paul Boateng, Ruth Kelly, John Healey and Dawn Primarolo.

Finance Bill

Dawn Primarolo accordingly presented a Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties, and to amend the law relating to the National Debt and the Public Revenue, and to make further provision in connection with Finance: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 79].

PETITION

Council Tax

9.15 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): I wish to present a petition on behalf of 1,000 readers of The Star newspaper in my constituency about the council tax. It reads as follows:

To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled,

The humble petition of the readers of The Star newspaper sheweth

That levels of council tax are too high and should be reduced.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the Deputy Prime Minister to reduce the levels of council tax in Buckinghamshire.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Health Services (Northavon)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.16 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): After two and a quarter hours of voting, it is good to have the opportunity to raise the future of hospital and community health services in my constituency. I particularly welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), to her place, because I understand that she grew up in Northavon, or at least spent 10 very happy years there. She will therefore appreciate some of the issues that I seek to raise about the need for health care not merely for those living in inner-urban areas, but for those who live in market towns and rural villages.

The future of hospitals and community health services in my constituency is in a state of flux, and it feels as though it has been like that for as long as I have been a Member of this House, and probably for a very long time before that. The local strategic health authority is preparing something called the Bristol health services plan, and it is indicative of the approach being taken that it is seen as a Bristol-driven process to look at the needs of the urban community. The fact that it also serves the more rural communities of south Gloucestershire and north Somerset does not seem to feature quite as strongly on the agenda of the strategic health authority as I would wish.

At present, the local health trusts are involved in what they call "engagement" with the local communities, rather than consultation, as they do not yet know what they want to do. Public meetings are being held, some of which are well attended, some of which are sparsely attended. I could have saved the trusts a good deal of trouble in that regard. As the Minister knows, I undertook my own "engagement" with my constituents, in which I issued a detailed and careful health survey to every household in the constituency. I received more than 8,000 replies, and I have supplied the Minister with a copy of the report of the survey.

Sometimes such surveys can be a bit dodgy, involving questions such as "Do you want your local hospital to be closed: yes or no?" We all know the value of the response to surveys such as those. I like to think that the exercise that I undertook was a bit more serious. It put to local residents some of the hard choices that have to be made and asked them whether, if local health professionals advocated a particular reconfiguration, they would endorse it, whether or not it was driven by clinical guidance.

I should like to report some of the survey results to the House. The most striking was that 81 per cent. of the constituents who responded felt that the residents of south Gloucestershire—as distinct from the residents of Bristol—were not being fully taken into the process. To give an example of that, the local national health service trust, North Bristol NHS trust, recently reported a massive financial deficit and invited local MPs to a meeting to tell them about it. I discovered on the day of the meeting that I had not been invited. The meeting was being held at Frenchay hospital, in my constituency. When I rang the hospital to ask why I had not been invited, I was told that the Bristol MPs had been invited, and that I was not in Bristol but in south Gloucestershire. This may sound like parochial nit-picking, but it goes to the heart of my concerns. Health care decisions are often driven by an urban agenda, and by the needs of the big city and the big conurbation. Areas such as south Gloucestershire can sometimes be marginalised in the decision-making process. When I turned up to the meeting, I asked whether local councillors had been invited, and I was told, "Yes, the Bristol city councillors are here," so I said, "Have any south Gloucestershire councillors been invited?" The reply was, "Oh, no, we didn't think about that." It is indicative that the Bristol health services plan has not paid attention to the needs of south Gloucestershire residents, and that is why I am pleased to raise the issue.

Not only did 81 per cent. of my constituents feel that south Gloucestershire's residents were not being listened to properly in this process, but there was substantial opposition to one of the key ideas coming forward. That idea was that of the two principal sites currently run by North Bristol NHS trust—Frenchay and Southmead—the current drift of thinking is that Frenchay should be at best downgraded, perhaps lose its A and E department, perhaps be no more than a community hospital, or even have nothing at all on the site. Some 81 per cent. of my constituents said that they would not accept that outcome, even if the trust said that that was on medical grounds. The public are very sceptical. They have heard about the financial position of the trust, and they are sceptical about the proposals being driven by health considerations rather than financial ones. One of the difficulties that the trust faces is that at the same time as trying to make long-term plans, it is trying to deal with a massive deficit. Short-term cuts are therefore going on at the same time as it tries to set out a long-term vision. That sends confusing messages to the local public about cuts.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: I will not at the moment. If I have time, I will do so later.

I put to my constituents the idea of some community-based facilities. One idea that I put to them was that of a walk-in minor injuries centre, perhaps at Yate, one of the principal population centres in my constituency. That idea was quite well received, but it was clear that people did not regard that as an adequate substitute for a properly resourced 24-hour accident and emergency unit at a proper hospital. My constituents will not be satisfied if they end up with somewhere to deal with bumps and bruises locally but lose access to a high-quality casualty unit 24 hours a day at a local major hospital, which they currently have at Frenchay.

I put some options to my constituents as to community facilities that they would like to see. The three that came out top were: first, a minor injuries unit, particularly in the Yate and Sodbury area, but there was also support in the Thornbury area; secondly, being able to have out-patient appointments nearer home, which obviously would be popular and, given the lamentable state of public transport in the area, very sensible; and thirdly, intermediate care beds. Certainly, the existing provision in my constituency at Thornbury hospital, which people are able to use nearer to home, rather than a big, slightly impersonal hospital, is very much valued.

Under the current process, local trusts are preparing what are known as strategic outline cases. Those are nearly finalised and will be submitted to the strategic health authority in the next few weeks. They will be sent on, assuming that they are approved by the strategic health authority, and will reach the Government by the end of April. I understand from talking to North Bristol NHS trust today that it is anticipated that the Department of Health will receive 11 of those strategic outline cases and is likely to approve five. The broad time scale to which it is working is by the summer. If that is not right, I hope that the Minister will correct me.

I want to ask the Minister what criteria the Department of Health will use in assessing those bids, which, I presume, will be from health authorities all around Britain. I want to suggest three criteria that I would like to see used. First, I do not want cuts in capacity. The current plan envisages cuts. At present, once minor adjustments have been made, North Bristol NHS trust has 1,563 beds. The draft strategic outline case that I have seen envisages cutting that by nearly 200 beds. That is at a time when demand, as a result of a rise in the population, would imply an increase of 281 beds. If we add those two numbers together, there is an implied shortfall, compared with present provision, of nearly 500 beds. In south Gloucestershire, the number of people over 65 will rise by half in the next decade or so, and the number of people over 75 will rise by a similar proportion. Given the huge growth in demand for hospital services, the idea that any strategic outline case would contain fewer beds than at present seems totally unacceptable.

We have seen what happens when hospitals do not have enough beds. Now we are confronted with the idea that we should plan on the basis of fewer beds. The theory is that the hospital will become more efficient, will drive people through more quickly, and will progress from being one of the worst to one of the best performers, freeing bed space and allowing the provision of care. Let us see the evidence. Let us see the hospital deliver improved throughput. Then we might look at how many beds are needed. The idea that we should plan on the basis of cutting hundreds of beds when population pressures imply that we should be adding hundreds of beds is totally unacceptable.

The Bristol Evening Post recently ran a front-page story about cancelled operations at North Bristol, another big problem for my local trust. The main reason given was lack of beds. If that is the situation now, what will it be like when 200 beds are taken away, given population pressures that should add a further 300? I simply do not accept that a strategic outline case based on bed cuts will be acceptable to my constituents.

The second thing that my constituents want is access to world-class facilities, including accident and emergency. Access is a key issue. The Minister knows, having been to school in a village in my constituency, that reaching Frenchay hospital works for many of my constituents, particularly in the main area of Yate and Sodbury. If casualty services were taken out of Frenchay hospital, which is mooted in the medium term, I think it unlikely that people would be able to travel from my constituency up towards the Cotswolds, from villages such as Charfield, where the Minister grew up, Wickwar or Hawkesbury to Southmead hospital in a decent period. It may be possible at some times of day, but at others, when the north of Bristol and the south of south Gloucestershire are clogged and the ring road is clogged, people could get stuck. I am not convinced that any strategic outline plan that removes 24-hour access to A and E from my constituents will be acceptable to them. I hope that the Government will take that into account when responding to the strategic outline case.

Dr. Naysmith: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as I did not observe protocol and ask him beforehand, and he has very little time. When consulting his constituents, did he ask them what they felt about the potential downgrading of Southmead rather than Frenchay? I ask because all three district acute hospitals in the Bristol-south Gloucestershire area serve the population of south Gloucestershire.

Mr. Webb: Every question I asked invited people to reply "Yes, just Southmead" or "Yes, just Frenchay", or yes to both or no to either. All the questions were framed on that basis. I must be straight with the hon. Gentleman: most of the population in my constituency are on the Frenchay side. While Thornbury residents look somewhat more to Southmead, they still look to Frenchay as well. I chose to refer to Northavon in choosing a title for the debate because I wanted to represent the interests of my constituents. They want quality provision that is accessible, and for them that means Frenchay. I am saying nothing against Southmead: my wife used to work there and my children were born there, and it is a good hospital. What I am saying is that to withdraw A and E and, indeed, perhaps more from Frenchay would be seriously detrimental to my constituents.

The third element that I think the strategic outline case should contain is scope for improvement in community facilities. Here I think we have the potential for more agreement. We have an excellent if small community hospital in Thornbury, in my constituency. Recently, and sadly, a friend of mine died there. The care that he, and particularly his family, received at that community hospital was second to none. Relatives and friends could just pop in. The hospital was small and friendly enough to enable his favourite armchair to be brought from home. That is a quality of care that cannot be found in some huge hospitals.

I hope that whatever emerges from the strategic outline plan will build on those strengths and will not undermine them. What that means to me is that Thornbury hospital must stay and, at the very least, continue what it is doing, even if not necessarily in exactly the same way: I do not want to give the impression that everything must be set in stone. My constituents and I accept that some hospital buildings are inadequate, that facilities are inadequate and that serious investment is needed. However, the idea that that should involve bed cuts, cutting access to A and E or any cut in community facilities is unacceptable to me.

The biggest area where new community facilities are needed is Yate and Chipping Sodbury. There was a big response to my survey in favour of that. The idea has been discussed and kicked around, and although I do not get a clear sense of how it will look, my constituents want new community facilities there.

My constituents have sent a clear message. I have engaged with them and reported their findings to the House and to local health professionals. We do not say that things must not change—nobody in their right mind would say that. We want capital funding from the Government to upgrade, to keep Frenchay hospital in particular at the forefront of developments, and to see it move forward. I hope that, if the local trust can present a plan to the Department of Health for increased capacity, better access to quality accident and emergency services and better community facilities, the Government will reward it in the summer by accepting its proposals. If the trust does not present such ideas, I hope that the Department will tell it that it is not serving the local community as it should.

9.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing the debate. I have listened to and appreciated his comments, not least because, as he remarked, I grew up in the area and know something of the local terrain. I pay tribute to all the staff in the local health economy area who, as he said, are committed to improving the local national health service.

In north Bristol, the health economy has already benefited from additional investment, and I shall give a few examples of that. A new children's high dependency unit opened at Frenchay hospital last November. It was funded by a grant of £858,000 from the Department of Health plus £800,000 a year from the local primary care trusts. A three-year project to improve and redevelop radiology services at Southmead has recently been completed at a cost of £2.5 million, including new equipment and building works. Now more than 130,000 examinations every year can take place using state-of-the-art diagnostic equipment. It is perhaps worth mentioning that the services provide more generally for the area because they are specialist facilities. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that they cover not only Thornbury residents but a wider scope of people from his constituency.

In January 2003, a new £600,000 satellite unit opened at Southmead hospital to improve the quality of life for renal dialysis patients. It provides 3,000 extra treatments a year for patients from a wide area.

I shall deal with the local issues that the hon. Gentleman raised shortly, but first I should like to point out that we all acknowledge the pressures on the NHS, not only in his constituency but throughout the country. We want not only to increase capacity but to improve clinical standards generally. We do not want more of the same but a radical re-examination of the provision of services. We want to design services around the needs of the patients and I was interested by the hon. Gentleman's comments about, for example, the strength of the cottage hospital experience.

It is our policy, in the framework in the NHS plan and in the "Shifting the Balance of Power" initiative to devolve more funding decisions to the front line. It is for primary care trusts, in partnership with strategic health authorities and other local stakeholders to determine the best use of their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health, tackling health inequalities and modernising services. They are in the best position to decide how to do that because of their specialist knowledge of the local economy.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that we all acknowledge that hospital and community services need to change if we are to continue to fulfil patients' needs and improve access. Services should not remain static for ever; they need to be responsive to local needs and changing needs. There are several different pressures on the service. However, providers of health and community services have a responsibility to live within their means. Those issues and many others need to be taken into consideration. Biggest is not always best. Indeed, we have already had an example of that. We need to recognise that patients want more, not fewer local services. We need to focus on redesigning, not relocating.

Perhaps it is worth mentioning the quality of the building stock at both hospitals in north Bristol, which the hon. Gentleman did not touch on. Frenchay and Southmead hospitals both have serious needs in building terms that must be addressed. They both have accident and emergency departments. There is a hospital with a major A and E department in the centre of Bristol, the Bristol royal infirmary.

The hospitals are between four and seven miles apart. Services are duplicated and fragmented across the two sites of the North Bristol NHS trust. They are cramped and rundown health centres. The current configuration makes it difficult to work effectively with primary and social care.

The current configuration means that there are particular difficulties in complying with national standards for clinical services, in particular for emergency patients, children, cancer patients, cardiac patients and those requiring specialist care. Therefore, the status quo is not an option—it cannot remain. There is clear scope for improving performance and, as I have said, the way in which health and community services in the 21st century are to be provided is less focused on hospitals than may have been the case in the past.

I come to the point that the hon. Gentleman made about the strategic outline case and the process. The outline case will be considered by all local NHS boards in April and the proposals will then go out to public consultation later this year. Although he talked about engagement and mentioned consultation, a very informal stage of the process has taken place in his area, in which he has been actively engaged recently. As part of that process, the local overview and scrutiny committee board will consider the matter as well. The plans will be transferred under normal processes to the strategic health authorities, which will ensure that a fair process is followed. They will not necessarily come to Ministers or to the Department. That is under the "Shifting the Balance of Power" arrangements that I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Webb: Just for clarification, central Government presumably need to decide which strategic health authorities get the very large amounts of capital funding that we are talking about, or is it the case that every strategic health authority gets a big capital budget and will then make the decision on the local projects? Clearly, the local trust was under the impression that the Department of Health would determine which five of the 11 bids went forward. Has it got that wrong?

Miss Johnson: As I understand it—this may prove not to be as accurate as it could be—it will be for those bodies to decide under normal circumstances. If there were some contest, as it were, there could be a question of a ministerial decision but normally the decision would be made at strategic health authority level.

The hon. Gentleman talked about his own survey and the future discussions and consultation. The local NHS in Northavon has embarked, with the local NHS in Bristol, on developing a Bristol health services plan. We need to have a range of options, and it is important to be able to engage the wider public in those discussions. Those will include developing acute services on either Southmead hospital or Frenchay hospital, with an associated development of a range of primary care and community-based services, as he mentioned. About six options are being canvassed.

The hon. Gentleman raised some real concerns about the proposals and has obviously taken a lot of time to compile the results of his survey. That is why I am grateful for the opportunity to assure him that no decisions have yet been made about the configuration of services. Indeed, the proposals are still being discussed as part of the engagement exercise that I mentioned, and that is being undertaken locally. Any decision will be made only once formal consultation has been completed. That is expected to start later this year.

Dr. Naysmith: The Minister will have gathered from my earlier intervention that I like to think that the aim of the changes that are taking place in Bristol and the south Gloucestershire area is to make the whole health community, as she described it, more efficient and work more effectively. That means that there will be no loss of any clinical specialties that are currently there, but that they may be moved from one site to another. I understand much of what the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) said and agree with a lot of it, but does she agree that the important thing is that patients in south Gloucestershire and Bristol as a health community end up with a much better service, irrespective of where the changes have to take place?

Miss Johnson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I can certainly confirm that there is considerable scope in existing arrangements for services to local patients to be much improved as a result of whatever changes are made to the existing configuration. The hon. Member for Northavon and my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith) will understand that there are various possibilities, all of which contain scope for improvement. We would not expect to see any loss of service at all from the changes.

To address my hon. Friend's point on the health economy and the need for balance in it, it is envisaged that the time scale in which the changes are likely to take place will take us beyond existing financial issues in the area. Those will be dealt with before those changes, as a precursor to them. The changes will not be a response to any financial deficit issues in the local economy, but are about considering with excitement the possibilities for

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members are, of course, of equal status, but they may have different experience in different ways. I do not want to get involved in a matter of debate—far worse things have been said in the House, and we can always seek to improve the standard of exchange. While I am on the subject, I want to hear less noise and more from the person who has the Floor of the House at the time.

Mr. Hawkins: We must examine what independent commentators say about what the Government are up to in trying to railroad the Bill through. I refer any hon. Members who have not seen them yet to the views expressed by the distinguished and senior home affairs correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, Mr. Phillip Johnston, on Monday of this week. In a well-observed column headed, "Now they want to abolish polling day", Mr. Johnston says:

"Surely this is a matter that requires all-party agreement. The electoral system is no more Labour's to tinker around with than is the constitution, whose ancient structures are being so casually dismantled in the name of 'modernisation'. Postal voting, while superficially attractive to politicians who think that we are all too bone idle to get off our backsides to go to a polling station, is wide open to fiddling, intimidation and fraud. It will mark the final disconnection between politicians and the electorate."

Mr. Johnston also deals with the canard that we heard at Prime Minister's questions earlier this afternoon, when an hon. Member suggested to the Deputy Prime Minister that postal ballots might mean fewer votes for extremist parties. As Mr. Johnston points out,

"The seats with the highest turnout in the 2001 general election were the three Northern Ireland constituencies where Sinn Fein candidates were elected."

Does not that give the lie to the suggestion that an increase in turnout means less support for extremists?

5.15 pm

Mr. Miller: To correct the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), I had a bigger turnout and a bigger absolute vote than the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins).

Does the hon. Member for Surrey Heath agree that although the article from The Daily Telegraph is right inasmuch as the voting system is not Labour's to tinker with, it is for this House to make a decision, and this House must take precedence over the other place, where nobody is elected?

Mr. Hawkins: I simply disagree with the hon. Gentleman. We take the view that the whole purpose of having a bicameral legislature is to give both Houses of Parliament a role. What we dislike is this Government's attempt to change the agenda as it suits them. During the debate on the Bill on 16 December, the Minister said—not once, not twice, not three times, but about six times—that the Government would have a third postal pilot. The volte face took place as soon as the Deputy Prime Minister got involved and insisted that both the north-west and Yorkshire and Humber be included. The Government have been completely inconsistent for party political reasons connected with the Deputy Prime Minister's obsession with the forthcoming referendums on regional government.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Lords is particularly important when a strong majority party in this House wishes to twist or distort the constitution or the electoral system? That is when the minority interests and parties need a voice. I am delighted that the Lords will provide that; the Government should be ashamed that they will not.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend: he is absolutely right.

We can rely on the Electoral Commission's firm view—despite the Minister's attempt to reinterpret it—that the north-west must be ruled out. The Electoral Commission is clear that it has not changed its mind from what it said in December or in January, and sticks to the reasons that it set out previously. That is why those in another place are absolutely right to continue to insist on backing the Electoral Commission. I am confident that in the end the Government will have to give up on this, because otherwise they will lose the Bill altogether. If they do, it will be entirely their own fault.

Mr. Clelland: My hon. Friend the Minister is right to resist the amendments, especially in light of the damage that has already been done to the Bill by the other House. The amendment requiring witness signatures, which will disfranchise thousands of people—mainly the elderly and those with communication difficulties—has been forced on the Government because the other place is using up time which, because of the approaching elections, this House unfortunately does not have, in order to defeat the Bill. Last week, the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister interviewed manufacturers of electoral materials who are telling the Government that time is running out in terms of producing those materials. The House of Lords is using that situation to force amendments on a reluctant Government.

Much comment has been made about the unelected House having undue influence over a matter relating to elections and electors' rights. Some might say that that makes the case for an elected House stronger. I would argue against that, because one can imagine the situation if these decisions were being made by an elected House. It would be much more difficult for this House to get anything through at all—we would have this legislative gridlock time after time. The Government are right to go back to the drawing board on the constitution of the second Chamber. [Interruption.] One of my hon. Friends says, "Abolish them." I am becoming more attracted to that idea as the days go by. We need to consider the powers of the House of the Lords before we start to consider who should sit and exercise them. That is what should have been done in the first place. I hope that we will take this opportunity to do it and that we do not get into this ridiculous situation again.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That was a briefer contribution from the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) than I was expecting, but it was valued nevertheless.

These ping-pong episodes are among the most unedifying things that we do in the House. As I said when we last debated these matters, it is rare to hear any new arguments on these occasions. However, there is a new element this time, in the form of the letter from the Electoral Commission, which the Minister has chosen to misrepresent to the House, and whose contents he has chosen to ignore. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] Hon. Members may say "Rubbish", but I have the faculty of being able to read. No Member who has read the letter from the Electoral Commission can be in any doubt as to what its conclusions are, and that poses a huge problem for the Government. The Lords have not introduced a killer amendment to the Bill. All that they have done is to make the perfectly reasonable propositions that the Electoral Commission, which the Government set up in order to give advice on electoral matters, should be heard on this matter, and that the Government should not be able to ignore its advice when introducing electoral pilots. Indeed, "pilot" is an inappropriate word to use when the proposal involves nearly half the local authorities in England. That is not a pilot; it is half the country.

We have heard the absurd argument that it would be a disgrace to democracy if there were no all-postal ballot in the north-west. However, we are not told that it would be a disgrace to democracy not to have one in the south-west. We are told that such a ballot is essential in the east midlands, but not the west midlands. [HON. MEMBERS: "Pilots!"] We now hear the word "pilots", but the three pilots that the Minister asked for in the first place are no longer sufficient. The Government, in the form of the Deputy Prime Minister, have determined that he wants half of England to be involved, and that just happens to be the half that lies to the north of the Trent.

I do not understand why the Deputy Prime Minister is so adamant that he should use the majority in the House to push through an electoral reform against the consensus of the political parties represented in the House and against the advice of the Electoral Commission. There was a time when there was a pretence that the Deputy Prime Minister was not guiding this whole affair, but that pretence has been blown apart by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has written to the Electoral Commission—we know not in what terms—and that he has had a rebuttal from it. The commission will not be persuaded that it should abandon its better judgment in this matter.

Having made a careful study of Yorkshire and Humber, the commission has said that its view has changed, and that it is now prepared to accept that Yorkshire and Humber is an appropriate area. Very well. If that is the case, I accept that as well. I have no wish not to extend this voting experiment to those areas in which it is suitable to do so. Let me tell hon. Members from Yorkshire and Humberside that I am now on their side, because they have the imprimatur of the Electoral Commission.

Mr. Watts: Is it Liberal Democrat policy that the Electoral Commission should be able to overrule the will of Parliament? Also, will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the view of the Liberal Democrat MEP, Chris Davies, is that postal voting is for lazy people? Does the hon. Gentleman believe that anyone who wants a postal vote is a lazy person?

Mr. Heath: No, I do not believe that. Frankly, it was an absurd thing for that Member of the European Parliament to say, and I wish he had not said it. Now that I have said that from the Front Bench, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will no longer try to use that argument in evidence against our party's apparent position. It is not the position of our party.

Mr. George Osborne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: In a moment. Let me answer one intervention at a time.

The role of the Electoral Commission is crucial when designing pilot schemes for innovative ways of voting. I would never have had a problem with the Government had they said, "We are not having a pilot scheme for this innovation. We will have a UK-wide all-postal ballot." I would have said, "Okay, let's have a go and see what happens in the European elections." However, that is not what is on offer. We have the absurd pretence that, somehow, the Government are doing as is recommended when we know that they are not and that this is appropriate for one part of the country and not appropriate for the rest.

Mrs. Browning: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Electoral Commission and its chairman are answerable not to Ministers but to the House? I sit on the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. The commission is called to our meetings to answer questions. If, as a member of that Committee, I discovered that the chairman had made a specific recommendation to the Government vis-à-vis fraud in the north-west and they had ignored it, they would be in very serious trouble with my Committee.

Mr. Heath: Let that be a warning to the Minister, because he is clearly going to be in trouble with the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission.

Hyperbole apart, this is a serious matter. We are discussing this country's electoral system and that should command the respect and agreement, as far as that is possible, of the parties that are contesting those elections. It is simply not right that a party that has a majority in the House—owing to what I think is a corrupt electoral system, and certainly on a minority of the vote—can have its way irrespective of the views of the Electoral Commission that it appointed.

Mr. Leslie: I have two brief comments to make. First, I hope that the hon. Gentleman withdraws his point about the House somehow being based on a corrupt democratic system. Secondly, will he justify the use of the House of Lords in persistently overturning the will of the House of Commons?

Mr. Heath: Perhaps the Minister uses the House of Lords for his purposes; I do not use the House of Lords. I respect the judgment of those who sit in the House of Lords at the moment, although I would like it to be reformed and given accountability through a proper electoral system.

[Mr. Heath]

I say that the system is corrupt because it does not reflect the votes that people cast, as the Minister perfectly well knows. That is why he can pray in aid a massive majority in the House won on a minority of the votes cast and say that it should overrule not only Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members of this House, but the other House, which he has chosen not to reform, as well as the independent body that was set up precisely—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Heath: Many Members want to intervene, but I give way to the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin), because I think I did her a disservice during a previous debate in not understanding the details of the pilot scheme in her constituency. I apologise to her for that.

Joyce Quin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who did not realise that the pilots are different in different areas. In my area, there is no requirement for a witness signature. He has laid great emphasis on supporting the Electoral Commission, but is it not the case that last week the amendment from the other place, which he introduced and which was accepted, ran counter to the view of the Electoral Commission regarding the witness signature?

Mr. Heath: You would rule us out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if we re-ran a debate on an amendment that has been passed into the legislation. [Interruption.] If I may, I will respond to the right hon. Lady. I am clear in my mind that the advice from the Electoral Commission was that we should have a pre-registration identity system. We have not yet achieved that. I understand from her what the pilot scheme in her constituency involves, which I did not understand before. I admit my ignorance on that. However, it does not alter the fact that for the generality of elections around the country, and for all those that would have lain outside the pilot regions in the election that we are debating, exactly the same system would have persisted. It does not therefore invalidate my argument, although I was incorrect in the detail, which is why I am happy to offer my apologies.

5.30 pm

Andy Burnham: I think that the hon. Gentleman was beginning to develop an argument that he would accept Yorkshire but not the north-west. Can he therefore confirm that the only outstanding case of electoral fraud ongoing in the north-west is against a Liberal Democrat in a traditional election opportunity?

Mr. Heath: I cannot confirm that, although I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right, as he has a more intimate knowledge of electoral affairs in the north-west than I do. I have never used the argument used by others that the key issue in the north-west is fraud. My argument has always related to one of the basic criteria set down by the Government, not me, that given the complexity of electoral arrangements in the north-west and that so many local authority elections are involved in the north-west, it is not an appropriate pilot. That is what the Electoral Commission said about the north-west, and that is the position to which it holds.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether my position was developing. In terms of identification of the regions, my position has always been that we accept the advice of the Electoral Commission, which originally proposed two regions, and has moved its position to accept Yorkshire and Humber. I am therefore happy to adopt that position today.

Andy Burnham: Is it not the case that the Liberal Democrats are singing two different tunes from one end of the Corridor to the other? The noble Lord Greaves has made great play of fraud in the north-west elections, which is why the Liberal Democrats have opposed this Bill down the other end of the Corridor. The hon. Gentleman is now advancing a different argument. Which is it? Clearly, there is no evidence of fraud in postal ballots in the north-west. To what are the Liberal Democrats opposed?

Mr. Heath: Again, the hon. Gentleman is referring to a previous debate. We are not talking about fraud today, because, I gently remind him, we have dealt with that issue. We are now talking about the selection of regions and only the selection of regions. The burden of our argument has always been that having set up an independent arbiter as to which region should be selected for a pilot and how many regions should be so selected, the Government are deciding that they know better than that independent arbiter, for whatever reason they wish to use.

Mr. Watts rose—

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Heath: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman, but I will give way to the hon. Lady if she still wants to intervene on me.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: As someone who shares the hon. Gentleman's support for electoral reform, may I ask whether he will accept my fundamental disappointment at the way in which Liberal Democrats in this place and the other place have handled this issue? First, they are saying that voters in Rochdale are too stupid to understand how a postal vote system would work. Secondly, what is the difference between the Yorkshire local government system and north-west local government system if he is seeking to say that it is more complicated, we are too stupid and we cannot understand it? And thirdly, does he not understand that there is just a tinge of hypocrisy to allowing the argument to be advanced in the other place, but not advancing it in this place, thereby allowing those in the other place to do your dirty work?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Lady clearly did not listen to the reply that I just gave. We have had a debate on electoral fraud, which has now been resolved, and we are now debating one amendment from the other place that deals only with the selection of regions. If she wants to say that accepting the advice of the Electoral Commission on Yorkshire and Humber in some way demeans or derides her constituents in the north-west, why are my constituents, who had an all-postal ballot at the elections last year, too stupid to have an all-postal ballot in these elections? Does she have an answer to that?

Mrs. Fitzsimons: The problem was pointed out by one of my hon. Friends earlier. It suited your purposes when you tabled an amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady, in her excitement, is not using the right language. None of this has anything to do with the Chair.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that there is some confusion among the Liberal Democrats. Last week, when they tabled an amendment, they disagreed with the Electoral Commission. This week, they have decided that its recommendations are their bible. Which is it?

Mr. Heath: I am not going to keep replying to the same intervention ad nauseam. The hon. Lady really needs to talk to her hon. Friends about the internal contradictions in their own arguments. Then she can start talking to me.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way? He said earlier that he would.

Mr. Heath: Oh, did I? Well, in that case I had better.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman just mentioned contradictions. Can he tell us why the Liberal Democrats accept the prospect of an all-out postal vote in the referendum that will take place in October, but do not accept the proposal for postal votes in the local government and European elections in the north-west in June?

Mr. Heath: Can the right hon. Gentleman explain to me why this is called the European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill? That is the crux of the matter. As I have said more times than I care to remember, I would have understood the Government's logic if they had applied their proposals to the European parliamentary elections as a whole.

Kali Mountford: That is not a pilot.

Mr. Heath: Half of England is not a pilot. That is the problem with the Government's position.

Sadly, I do not think that we are making any progress. The reason for that is the Government's intransigence and incompetence. The proposal will now go to the other place, and a deal will be done. The Lords will accept Yorkshire and Humberside, or the Government will lose their Bill. Then we shall have the three regions that the Electoral Commission has identified as suitable, and the Government will have the three pilots that they said they wanted in the first instance. Why on earth could they not have said that here this evening? Because they want the Lords to take the blame for their incompetence.

Kali Mountford: I must start by agreeing with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). It is sad that we can agree on the fact that we are making no progress whatever. This House should be allowed to make progress, because this House has made its position clear. This House contains the democratically elected representatives of our constituents, and the other House does not. I should have thought that that was of some importance to this House.

That is important to this House because we are discussing how it should formulate elections for the future, and what will happen when we change an electoral system that has a direct bearing on its work, and a less direct bearing on the work of the other place. The line has been revealed by statements made in the other place. The Lords do not object to a pilot, or even to the number of areas included in the pilot; they are against postal balloting per se. Their main objection is to the fact that elections would be more convenient. What an absurd objection! It is absurd to suggest that a disabled person, a person who works very hard or a person who works different shifts should not have the right to a postal vote.

Incidentally, all those people can apply for a postal vote under the current system. As they can do that on an individual basis, with all the expense that that entails, why is it not sensible to think about what will happen when that convenience is extended to everyone, and the distortion caused by the requirement for applications is removed?

Andy Burnham: We have heard of the great experience at the other end of the Corridor. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Lords vote was carried by the hereditary peers? What right have they to advise any Member of this House, whatever his or her age, about electoral practice?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind both hon. Members of the precise terms of the amendment.

Kali Mountford: I will limit myself to saying how much I agree with what my hon. Friend has said, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We must ask what benefit will accrue from the pilot, who will be included, and why this House should or should not take cognisance of what is said in the other place and what is said by the Electoral Commission. We are surely not saying in this debate that we should have government by commission. That would be absurd. It is for this House and this Government to take account of what advice the Electoral Commission gives, but then to make up our own minds on the value of that advice—with some of which we agree and with some of which we do not agree. It is perfectly sensible to say that we want the pilots to cover a larger area, and to include more circumstances against which we can check the outcome. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome kept saying that half the electorate would be included in the pilot, but that is incorrect. If he cannot do his sums, he should look at the figures again. By my reckoning, 31 per cent. is not half.

Mr. Watts: I agree with my hon. Friend. Does she share my lack of understanding of how the Liberal

[Mr. Watts]

Democrats can support postal voting in referendums on regional government, but not in European or local elections? Are not those two stances at odds with each other?

Kali Mountford: It is hardly surprising that the Liberal Democrats are at odds on any issue. It is hardly surprising that they have hung themselves on a particular hook over the precise terms of this afternoon's debate. It suits them to forget the convenient arguments that they have used on other issues at other times. Nevertheless, let us examine what they have said. They have said that what is good enough for the goose is not good enough for the gander. I say that this gander will have its way.

Mr. Redwood: The proposal from the House of Lords is a modest and reasonable compromise, when the Government are trying to ride roughshod over minority party interests and the interests of anyone who wishes to see sensible reform at a steady pace. I do not speak as one who is against postal ballots in principle; in theory, they are very good. The problem is the practice, because there are a number of genuine concerns about whether such ballots can be administered fairly and well, without corruption, pressure, personation and all the other problems that any true democrat abhors.

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Question put, That this House disagrees with Lords amendment 1D to Commons amendment 1C:—

Equitable Life Inquiry

[Relevant document: the oral evidence taken before the Treasury Committee on Tuesday 16th March, on the Equitable Life Inquiry, HC 71-iv, Session 2003–04.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now Adjourn.—[Ruth Kelly.]

5.59 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The House will recall that the origin of the Equitable Life inquiry carried out by Lord Penrose was the financial crisis experienced by the society in July 2001, when it closed to new business and cut policy values. The inquiry's terms of reference were to inquire into the circumstances of the Equitable Life assurance society, taking account of the relevant life market background, to identify the lessons to be learned for the conduct and administration of life assurance business, and to give a report thereon to Treasury Ministers.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): On the lessons learned, the Financial Secretary will be aware that Lord Penrose found that regulatory failure was the fundamental reason for, if not the primary cause of, the company's financial crisis. Is it now Government policy never to consider compensation where there has been regulatory failure of any sort?

Ruth Kelly: If the hon. Gentleman were to acquaint himself in greater depth with the contents of the report, he would see that Lord Penrose says specifically that regulatory system failures failed policyholders in this case. He does not point to operational failure. However, I shall deal with that point later.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway), can the Financial Secretary envisage any circumstances in which there would be a case for the Government to pay compensation to policyholders? Or would she rule out the payment of compensation in any circumstances that she could foresee?

Ruth Kelly: I have considered in great depth the contents of Lord Penrose's report. Lord Penrose makes no recommendation for compensation. He finds no instance of maladministration by the regulator, nor does he make any allegation of negligence by the regulator. The Treasury has also examined the contents of its report. We see no reason to think that the regulator was negligent or that there was any maladministration at any time while the society was being regulated by the Treasury or, indeed, under the previous regime.

Clearly, the Treasury cannot underwrite every business in the country. No regulator can ever provide a 100 per cent. guarantee against failure. However, Lord Penrose says that blame would have to be apportioned through the court system. He says:

"It was not for me to measure any person's actions against accepted standards of conduct defining the legal duties of other people performing comparable duties in other organisations and other similar circumstances."

He considers that

"Breach of duty, and the financial consequences of breach, are properly matters for the established courts of justice and for other appropriate tribunals in the financial sector."

That is not my analysis, but the analysis of Lord Penrose himself. He finds that, from the early 1970s, the society embarked on a growth strategy that resulted in the progressive financial weakening of the society, such that its ability to meet the long-term expectations of its policyholders was in doubt from the late 1980s onwards.

Lord Penrose describes how the company deliberately ran down its inherited estate and then, in the 1980s, moved into deficit to keep up bonus levels and win market share. According to Lord Penrose, sustained growth became an independent objective pursued with something approaching missionary zeal. He adds:

"Bonus policy became central to achieving the Society's marketing objectives"

and that

"the surplus published by the Society became a function of the desired level of bonus."

He outlines how, in 1973, the society introduced the concept of a terminal bonus and then, in the 1980s, progressively shifted the bonus mix away from annual guaranteed reversionary bonuses towards terminal bonuses, which were not covered by reserves. That allowed the society to inflate bonus levels to a level higher than available assets would have implied.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Does the Financial Secretary accept that the financial condition of Equitable Life was much worse in 1997, 1998 and 1999 than it was some years earlier and that that gave the regulators a much greater opportunity to intervene and take action to try to protect policyholders in the late 1990s than at any time earlier?

Ruth Kelly: I could quote from Lord Penrose's report on that point, but I shall quote from the independent authority of the ombudsman, who considered that specific period. She says:

"There is no doubt that in late 1998 the Treasury had briefed FSA in considerable detail about Equitable's weak regulatory solvency position and had indicated a possible need for the regulator to intervene . . . it is very evident . . . the prudential regulators' stated approach to their role . . . could not be criticised for a lack of concern about Equitable and the position of their policyholders nor could their approach in respect of Equitable be described as 'passive'."

Lord Penrose writes:

"By disregarding accrued terminal bonus, the Society was able to over-allocate bonus beyond available assets at market value, and in particular to make payments on claims that exceeded the relative available assets at the time".

By 1989, according to Lord Penrose:

"the Society deliberately distributed a high proportion of the available return for market-related reasons, and entered the 1990s with a negative estate accordingly."

The society was therefore unable to withstand the financial implications of the House of Lords judgment in the Hyman case.

Lord Penrose says:

"Superficially claims of £1.5 billion should not have brought down a society with funds of £32 billion."

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend will know that Lord Penrose appeared before the Treasury Committee last week and said that the society was largely the author of its own misfortune. However, on the very point made by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), I hope that my hon. Friend will be aware of Chris Headdon's interview on Radio 4 this morning, when he said that Lord Penrose did not find any evidence of concealment. She will also be aware of the financial reinsurance product—the side letter—that Chris Headdon had, of which the Financial Services Authority was not aware. Indeed, the FSA has said that, if it had been aware of the side letter, it would not have guaranteed anything with regard to the society. Does that not raise questions about a deliberate policy of concealment on behalf of the executive in Equitable Life?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes some very interesting points. Of course it is not for me to comment on any action that may be taken by the FSA, the prosecution wing of the Department of Trade and Industry or the Serious Fraud Office, although he will be aware that Lord Penrose has forwarded his report to the SFO. Lord Penrose is clear that a unique situation was developing at Equitable Life. He states:

"The Society's uniqueness lay in the approach adopted by its management, not in the essential characteristics of its business."

With regard to the reinsurance treaty, Lord Penrose is absolutely clear as well that

"Those involved at the society were not in any doubt that a right for the reinsurer to cancel in those circumstances would undermine the regulatory value of the agreement."

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Did the regulators not require the reinsurance provision, and was not the response of the people who then had control of the society to threaten to sue the regulators?

Ruth Kelly: Again, my hon. Friend makes an extremely valid point. Reinsurance treaties were granted relatively routinely, but he draws attention to, in effect, the difficult relationship that existed between the regulators and the society over quite a long period, under the stewardship of the FSA, the Treasury and, indeed, the DTI before that, particularly in relation to guaranteed annuity rates.

I should make it clear to the House that the Government sympathise with the plight of policyholders who have suffered not only much worry and distress over the past few years, but significant reductions in their expected income in retirement as a result of those issues. As I outlined to the House in my statement on 8 March, Lord Penrose finds that that weakening of the society was made possible by a culture of manipulation and concealment on the part of the company's previous senior management. The report details how executive management failed to keep the board fully informed about the true state of the company's financial position.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Financial Secretary will be aware that hundreds of thousands of people around the country are suffering as a result of that extremely unfortunate situation. Those people acted in good faith and have done nothing wrong. What have the Government got to offer them, other than sympathy?

Ruth Kelly: The key conclusion to draw from Lord Penrose's report is not only the one to which my hon. Friends have pointed—

"Principally, the Society was the author of its own misfortunes"

as Lord Penrose says—but that, as he also says:

"If the proposals in hand for the future of the new regulatory regime are implemented and if they are effective in practice, the major criticisms of the earlier regulatory regime will have been addressed both in relation to the general approach to regulation and in relation to the particular issues arising from discussion of regulation of the Society."

So policyholders throughout the country, both in the society and in other life assurance societies, as well as in financial services more generally, can be reassured that Lord Penrose himself concludes that the FSA reforms introduced by this Government, which started in 1997, were the ones that have put the regulatory system on to a fair basis and that can address these issues.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Although Lord Penrose states that the society was the author of its own misfortunes, he goes on to say:

"Regulatory systems failures were secondary".

Does the Minister accept the proposition that a secondary cause can none the less be a significant issue? The fact that a cause is secondary does not mean that it is non-existent. Should not the Government take some responsibility for that secondary cause, which was a failure?

Ruth Kelly: I shall deal with the regulatory system failure in great detail later in my speech. Profound lessons for the House arise from Lord Penrose's report, and I am sure that when the hon. Gentleman reflects on its contents, he will also reflect on his role in these affairs.

Lord Penrose states:

"Substantial amounts of technical and financial information were provided to the Board . . . These failed fully to present the overall financial position of the Society, and in particular the risks inherent in the policies that were pursued in relation to bonus allocation".

He finds that

"the Board's understanding of the annuity guarantee issue was at best limited until the Autumn of 1997, and some directors may not have had any understanding of the position."

He also states:

"Arguably the first and most significant failure in this report lay at the heart of the Society . . . The Board at no stage got fully to grips with the financial situation faced by the Society: information was too fragmented, their collective skills were inadequate for the task, and there were no effective arrangements for ensuring that there was detailed examination of, and onward reporting to the Board on, actuarial reports."

Lord Penrose notes that there were

"executive directors with relevant actuarial qualifications but little or no relevant experience".

As for the board's non-executive directors, he notes that they "were so wholly dependent on actuarial input from the chief executive/actuary that they were largely incapable of exercising any influence on the actuarial management of the Society".

Furthermore, he finds:

"None of the non-executive members of the Board had relevant skills or experience of actuarial principles or methodologies".

He states

"the non-executive directors generally had a poor understanding of the Society's developing financial position."

He goes on to describe the board as a

"self-perpetuating oligarchy amenable to policyholder pressure only at its discretion."

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The issue of the role of non-executive directors is not limited only to Equitable Life. We have seen numerous reports on what needs to happen with regard to that role. Are the Government now looking seriously at the matter, not necessarily in terms of legislation or regulation, but to seek to find some arrangement with the City so that we can sort things out once and for all?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Department of Trade and Industry recently discussed in the course of preparing the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill the respective responsibilities that non-executive directors should be expected to have. The Government are actively taking that issue forward.

Lord Penrose describes how the management also failed in its obligations to disclose full information to its own policyholders and to the regulators. He finds that the management of the society fixed on the differential terminal bonus policy as early as 1983, but did not inform policyholders for more than a decade. He says:

"The policy was not disclosed to policyholders by direct communication, in any way, until 1996 . . . Failure to disclose this intention must be regarded as a serious omission in communication to policyholders of relevant information about their prospective interests from at least 1988, and arguably from the time in the early 1980s that management first took that decision."

Even when the company decided to inform policyholders in 1996, it was done badly. Penrose states:

"Attempts were made to change expectations in 1996 and later years. These were ill-conceived, poorly expressed and confusing. The intimations to policyholders were generally uncommunicative."

As for the society's approach to the regulators in that period, Lord Penrose notes that Mr. Ranson, the appointed actuary from 1982, and both chief executive and appointed actuary of the company between 1991 and 1997, was "frequently aggressive" in his dealings with regulators, "dismissive" of regulators' concerns and "obstructive" of scrutiny. The regulatory returns were, Lord Penrose says, "opaque and uncommunicative", and

"failed to identify in value the growing guaranteed obligations that resulted from a combination of falling interest rates and lightening mortality."

Lord Penrose therefore argues that primary responsibility for the society's problems lies with the society and its former management, saying:

"Principally, the Society was the author of its own misfortunes."

Lord Penrose makes it clear that Equitable Life was unique. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), Lord Penrose says:

"The Society's uniqueness lay in the approach adopted by its management, not in the essential characteristics of its business."

That unique management approach led to the fundamental weakening of the society, as its inherited estate was run down and ultimately became negative. Nevertheless, Lord Penrose's verdict on the regulatory system is perfectly clear.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that the managing director, who directed the society, was also the appointed auditor led to a clear conflict of interest that should not have arisen?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right that a conflict of interest arises in that situation. It is precisely to avoid such a conflict of interest that reforms to the Financial Services Authority have been introduced to remove responsibility from the appointed actuary and place it firmly on the board of insurance companies, where it should properly be.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I declare an interest as a former policyholder with Equitable Life. I still have one school fees policy, for the good that it does me.

The Financial Secretary is giving us a précis of the Penrose report, which we can all read for ourselves, but she has not told us what the Government are going to do, having read the report. Will she do so, and if so, at what stage?

Ruth Kelly: I shall tell the House about the way forward very shortly, but I thought it important to expose the contents of Lord Penrose's report to the House, as he makes some profound comments about the operation of the regulatory regime before the FSA was set up.

Lord Penrose's verdict on the regulatory system is perfectly clear, as he says:

"the regulatory system failed policyholders in this case".

However, he adds:

"regulatory system failures were secondary."

He clearly states that it was

"the system that failed to provide the regulation that changing circumstances in the industry required, not that there was failure to implement what was fundamentally a satisfactory system."

He makes no allegation of maladministration or negligence against the regulator or individuals, and says:

"I do not pin the blame on individuals, who in the main have operated in good faith and to the best of their abilities within the system as they found it."

Nor does he suggest that any individual regulatory decision led to economic loss by policyholders. Specifically, he notes that "it is not enough in this case to infer from the coincidence of systems deficiencies and loss that one caused or contributed to the other".

The House should reflect carefully on the lessons that he draws about the nature of the reactive and under-resourced regulatory system in place before 1997 and his key message that the regulatory system must be kept up to date to take account of industry developments. Lord Penrose states:

"It seems not unreasonable to suggest that those in control of any supervisory regime have a duty . . . to take steps to ensure that the systems of regulation that are in force and enforced remain relevant to the changing requirements of the industry."

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): The Financial Secretary is being careful to pin the blame on the regulatory regime before 1997, but is it not the case that in 1998 and 1999, after discussions had taken place in the Treasury and in the FSA about the financial viability of Equitable Life, Equitable Life salesmen were still visiting my constituents and selling them with-profits policies which ultimately caused them substantial loss? How can she therefore claim that all was well after 1997, after the reforms that her Government introduced, when palpably for my constituents that was not the case?

Ruth Kelly: As Lord Penrose himself recognises, it is not possible to introduce a fundamental overhaul of a regulatory regime overnight. If the hon. Gentleman cares to consult the Penrose report he will see that it states that that is on page 722 of the report at paragraph 215. I quote further:

"the regulators persisted in a reactive stance in respect of PRE"—

"In day-to-day regulatory practice, officials operated within the constraints imposed by the existing system, and they had no alternative but to do so."

The regulatory regime was in the process of being overhauled.

As Lord Penrose says, the Equitable case argues strongly for a closer merging of

"prudential and conduct of business regulation"

and he says that while setting up the FSA

"the need for greater regulatory resource had been identified for the Treasury."

The House will no doubt be interested in the fact that whereas before 1997 there were 70 supervisors supervising 800 life companies, compared with 400 staff regulating 600 banks, that figure for the regulation of life companies has been doubled by the reforms that the Government introduced. The FSA has not only doubled the resources allocated to life insurance regulation, but significantly upgraded the personnel devoted to that task.

Today I want to concentrate on the way forward, drawing on Lord Penrose's conclusions on the lessons learned from his investigation. We are continuing the process of regulatory reform that we began in 1997, pushing forward in particular the specific changes in the life insurance sector that the FSA has in train. In addition, we are acting on Lord Penrose's suggestions been suggested in this place and in the House of Lords that such ballots might have more to do with the convenience of the electorate than with getting the greater turnout that all-postal ballot pilots have already achieved. Let us have more democracy and participation, and less hypocrisy from the Opposition.

Q6. [163183] Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): What are the qualities that the Deputy Prime Minister looks for in a European Commissioner, and does the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) possess any of them?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) would be well able to do the job, and the same is true of a lot of other Labour Members. I read in the press that I am backing certain people. The press have got it wrong again, but I do not want to get into personalities. The Labour Benches are so full of talent that the decision will be a difficult one for the Prime Minister.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the Department of Health has published a very important document today, entitled "Winning The War On Heart Disease." As chairman of the all-party group on heart disease, I welcome that document, but what extra measures can we adopt to ensure that we build on the successes that we have achieved to date?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am pleased that my hon. Friend has drawn attention to that document, which points out that we are making some remarkable advances in respect of heart operations. That is welcome news, and to be fair, the Opposition spokesman on the national health service has also welcomed it, saying:

"No one welcomes those improvements more than I do. It is excellent news that progress has indeed been made".—[Official Report, 22 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 597.]

We want to build on that progress, and I should have thought that Members on both sides of the House would take the view that the national health service does a wonderful job and that we want to do all that we can to improve it. We have made our position clear, which is that billions of pounds in resources have to be put into the health service, whereas the Opposition have decided that, basically, they want to reduce resources. That will provide a clear choice. I have often heard it said that there might be some more money for health and education, but I should like to see their proposals.

I concede that the Opposition have said that they would not subject health and education to the kind of cuts that they are prepared to implement elsewhere, but I shall wait to see exactly what that means. An £18 billion cut in the first two years of a Tory Administration would mean that nearly everyone would be open to such attacks. If the Opposition want to say that the cuts would affect only defence, housing and other such areas, then okay, let them be clear about it. But on health, we have the success story of winning the battle against heart disease. All Members will welcome the fact that death rates are down by 23 per cent., and our target is to deliver 6,000 extra operations one year earlier.

Court Papers (Wrongful Disclosure)

12.30 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con) (Urgent Question): Will the Solicitor-General make a statement on her Department's wrongful disclosure of court papers to the Minister for Children?

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): This question relates to the case of Re B, a minor, who was the subject of a care order on the ground that the child had been harmed by the mother, who was suffering from Munchausen's syndrome by proxy. The House will remember that I made a statement on 20 January after the Court of Appeal gave its judgment in the case of Angela Cannings. That was a criminal case where the mother was alleged to have been suffering from Munchausen's syndrome by proxy, but she was freed by the Court of Appeal.

The House will remember that I announced that we had set up a review to establish whether there were any other cases where the expert evidence had been central to the conviction and that such cases would be re-examined by the Director of Public Prosecutions and, if necessary, by the Criminal Cases Review Commission.

In answer to questions and expressions of concern about injustices that might have happened, not in the criminal courts but in the family courts, I told the House that the Minister for Children would be responsible for considering the implications of the Cannings case for cases involving care proceedings in the family jurisdiction. That statement in the House received widespread media coverage, which was understood by some to be an announcement that the Minister for Children was herself going to review individual family cases.

On 23 February, the Minister for Children made a statement to this House explaining that she was issuing guidance about how local authorities should proceed to review care cases where the basis of the evidence was expert testimony that the mother was suffering from Munchausen's syndrome by proxy. After the reporting of my statement to the House, I had a number of discussions with people raising the question of reviewing cases involving care proceedings. That includes, for example, discussions with some hon. Members and with the director of social services for Southwark, in my own constituency.

I was told by a solicitor, who happened to be my sister, that she was considering what action to take in respect of a client of hers who was seeking to challenge an order of the High Court taking the child into care. Part of the evidence had been that the mother was suffering from Munchausen's syndrome by proxy, about which I had been liaising closely with the Minister for Children. The solicitor in the case of Re B, a minor, sent me a copy of the High Court judgment, which I read. The names had been blanked out, so I did not, and do not, know the name of the child or the family. I simply looked at the court judgment.

I formed the view, on reading it, that it was likely to form the basis of a ruling by the Court of Appeal that could assist local authorities and others in understanding whether the issues raised in the Cannings case—a criminal case, of course—had any implications for care cases in the family jurisdiction. I thought that the Minister for Children should be aware of the judgment.

I understand that, subsequently, the Court of Appeal had itself notified the Minister for Children of the judgment in Re B, a minor, and offered to send her a copy of that judgment and all the papers, and invited her to consider whether she wanted to intervene in that case. It gave leave for the judgment and associated papers to be sent to her. Before I sent the judgment—without the names—to the Minister for Children, I sought legal advice from my office. I was advised that there was no prohibition on my doing so because the names had all been blanked out, and subject only to checking with the solicitor that there was no specific ruling in the case that prohibited disclosure. Having checked with the solicitor, I then sent the judgment to the Minister for Children.

When the local authority responsible for the care proceedings challenged my sending the judgment to the Minister for Children, the lawyer in my office who advised me reconsidered the question and decided that he probably was wrong, and that I should not have sent the judgment to the Minister for Children without a court order.

However, I can reassure the House that I acted on legal advice. I did not identify the child: I could not do so, in any event, as I did not know the child's identity. Also, in any event, the Court of Appeal subsequently asked the Minister for Children to consider whether she wanted to intervene in the case, and gave leave for the disclosure to her of all the papers in this case on 23 February.

Mr. Grieve: I thank the Solicitor-General for her statement, which has certainly helped to clarify what appeared in the press this morning. Does she agree, however, that it is an extremely unfortunate state of affairs when the Law Officers Department, which after all is supposed to advise the Government on the law, does not know the rules covering contempt of court and the confidentiality of documents? Does she also agree that, in such cases, it is not appropriate for Law Officers to pass responsibility on to those to whom they turn for advice, as their role and function must require them to take responsibility for their own actions in respect of documents that come into their possession? Will the Solicitor-General assure the House that the case is not another example of the gradual erosion of the principle of the confidentiality of documents, or of the Government taking the view that they have a right to anything that comes into their possession? That must be one of the inferences that could be drawn from how the documentation was handled.

A second question relates to the handling of cases involving Munchausen's syndrome by proxy under civil proceedings. The Solicitor-General will confirm that we were told that the matter would be reviewed by local authorities, according to guidelines set out by the Minister for Children. However, does not this episode highlight the fact that that system does not appear to be working properly? The Solicitor-General has, at least, intervened to pass documents to the Minister for Children that would allow her to intervene against a decision made by a local authority. Can the right hon. and learned Lady reassure the House about how the process is working in practice? Are there other examples of local authorities being unwilling to co-operate or to act according to the guidelines laid down by her and the Minister for Children?

These are important issues. I hope that the Solicitor-General can provide some proper reassurance.

The Solicitor-General: I am sure that I can give the hon. Gentleman that reassurance. It is not a question of not knowing the rules. I am very clear that I take responsibility for my actions in the case, and I remind the hon. Gentleman what the rules are. They state that it is a breach of the Children Act 1989 to do anything that identifies, or which would tend to identify, any child involved in any proceedings. I think that I have made it absolutely clear that it was not the case that I breached those rules.

Under the Administration of Justice Act 1985, a second prohibition prohibits some publications of proceedings in private. The question that arises at that point has to do with what constitutes a publication. The hon. Gentleman will know that that has been the subject of some considerable consideration by the courts. Therefore, this is not an open-and-shut case, in which the only question is whether the action taken was in breach of the rules. It is a question of how far the rules extend, but it is certainly absolutely clear that I was fully aware of the provisions of the Children Act 1989. I did not breach them and I did not identify the child involved.

One approach that I could have adopted, but did not, was to argue before the court that to send one copy of the judgment to a fellow Minister did not amount to publication within the meaning of the Administration of Justice Act 1985. That was an approach that I could have taken, but I left it. I am happy to accept responsibility, and I hope that I have made that clear.

The hon. Gentleman's second point concerned any erosion of the principle of confidentiality. There was no erosion of that principle, or of any other principle. The hon. Gentleman also made a wider point and implied that because I had discussions with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children the system had not worked and that somehow I had intervened. The system did work. I became aware that a judgment by the Court of Appeal was forthcoming. As it happens, I took the same view as the Court of Appeal. It became aware that it was about to make a judgment that would have implications for the review by the Minister for Children. It thought that she should know about the case and it wrote to her. I became aware that the Court of Appeal was about to consider a case that might have implications for the review by the Minister for Children. I thought that she needed to know about it and, having taken legal advice and considered the legal issues myself, I sent her information about that case.

The hon. Gentleman would have more justification if he had said that on this important issue of the crossover between the civil and criminal jurisdictions, in cases involving Munchausen's syndrome by proxy, the left hand of Government does not know what the right hand is doing. One Minister considered the criminal issues and another considered the family issues. All such cases involve a lack of confidence in and a fresh consideration of Munchausen's syndrome by proxy and, therefore, the primary responsibility for the family jurisdiction lies with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children. I thought that it was right that she should see the case, and the Court of Appeal thought the same, separately. On that issue, it was a case of great minds thinking alike.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I am grateful to the Solicitor-General for the clarity of her reply. It is a misfortune that the solicitor in the case in question is her sister, but let us set that aside. Let us also recognise that whatever she may have done in the court system is a matter for the courts, not for the House. We need to consider what the Solicitor-General has done.

I find it difficult to reconcile what the Solicitor-General has told us today—that the paper passed was an anonymised judgment—and what Mr. Justice Munby is reported as having said, which was that a Department had no right to see a family division file. He said that it needed leave from a judge to do so and found that a contempt had been committed in this case. I do not doubt the good intentions of the Solicitor-General in this important and difficult area of public policy. However, given that her ministerial responsibilities include civil litigation and advice on civil law matters, including charity and family law issues, and that her secretariat is intended to provide high-grade legal advice, it is a matter for concern that matters were got wrong in this instance, because that undermines confidence in her Department.

Does the Solicitor-General agree that wider issues still need to be resolved? I suggest that one is the quality of advice available to families who have been involved in a case of Munchausen's syndrome by proxy. It should be possible to gather information in a way that does not conflict with court rules to inform Government policy on the issue. She is right to say that we need an effective crossover between civil and criminal practice in that area. Does she accept that, in this instance, she did not choose the right way to go about it?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that Mr. Justice Munby says that a Minister has no right to see a family court file, but, of course, I do have the right to see family court files in some cases because I have a responsibility to intervene to assist the courts in family cases.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The right is limited.

The Solicitor-General: The right hon. Gentleman assists me by saying that the right is limited. Perhaps I can just make it absolutely clear to the House that I want to do my job properly. I want to assist with the administration of justice. I want to abide by the rules. I want to be absolutely clear that that is the case. Obviously, I shall consider how the different Acts of Parliament—the Children Act 1989 and the Administration of Justice Act 1985—and the different jurisdictions with which I have some involvement intersect. I will make the position clear, and perhaps that will assist the House.

The quality of the advice that is available to people who challenge care rulings in respect of their families is a matter for the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the Law Society.

On the point about gathering information, there is an issue about how we can discuss cases in principle and how the law is working in principle when there is an absolute prohibition on discussing the circumstances of individual cases, but that is a wider point about which the House has been concerned.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): My right hon. and learned Friend will be more aware than most of the excellent work that Sarah Harman—the solicitor in this case—has done over recent years. She takes on some of the most difficult and, frankly, unpopular cases. She is held in the highest esteem, not just in east Kent but right across the country. However, does my right hon. and learned Friend share my additional concern that Friday's judgment could effectively deny MPs access to papers and documents that could be crucial in their assisting with certain casework? Frankly, some of that casework involves the most difficult and sensitive subjects that ever come to visit us in our surgeries.

The Solicitor-General: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments about Sarah Harman, and I wish to take up the additional point that he raises, which is important for the whole House. There can be very few hon. Members on either side of the House who have not had a man come into their surgeries saying, "There has been an injustice. I'm not allowed to see my children." That is the background of the case, and it is what the court has said. There can be very few hon. Members who have not experienced a woman coming to their surgeries saying, "The council has got a court order to take my children into care, and this is wrong and an injustice." That happens regularly. There is a question about where the correct response lies because Parliament must perhaps provide an avenue, a safety valve, an opportunity for those who feel that they have suffered an injustice to come to speak to their MP. Perhaps that is the right position; or perhaps the right position is that, because of the laws that we have passed in the House and their interpretation by the judges, we should tell those constituents, "Don't speak to me about this. By speaking to me, you are in contempt. Please go away. I'm not even going to talk to you."

On the point raised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve)—I do not know whether he has had the opportunity to see the full judgment—we need to be clear exactly how the situation lies, so that we can protect the interests of children, the administration of justice in the family division and the opportunity for the House to be a safety valve for our constituents who feel that they have suffered an injustice, rather than seeing them dress up as Spiderman and climb up on to a crane.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Is it not regrettable that the Solicitor-General thought it appropriate to refer us to the internal workings of her Department in mentioning another lawyer's advice? It is her advice as the Solicitor-General that is important, and not the internal advice that she may have received from her lawyers in the Department. She is here as the Solicitor-General and is accountable to us in that guise. Surely, the matter is all the more regrettable when one considers her involvement in the law of disclosure. She will remember, 25 years or so ago, the case of Harriet Harman v. the Home Office, which related to improper disclosure of documents. It seems to me that her conduct over the past few days in this matter, although understandable, is regrettable.

The Solicitor-General: The hon. and learned Gentleman raised the question of the case of Harman v. the Home Office, but what he omitted to say was that it was subsequently decided that I had not acted improperly. Perhaps I could remind the House, for those who cannot remember this case of 25 years ago, that it was decided I had not acted improperly in that case. I should like to set the record straight on that, in case anybody is putting two and two together and making five.

On the question of the internal workings of the Department, the local authority in question wrote to me and sought information about exactly what had happened prior to my being sent the judgment and after my having been sent the judgment. I responded to it, and copied this into the court. Having written to the local authority and sent a copy to the court, I do not think that it is right to give a partial version to this House. Therefore, I am giving the House the information in as full a form as that in which I gave it to the local authority and the court. It was in that spirit that I gave that information.

As former Law Officers will know, it is not at all unusual for Law Officers to take a preliminary view and then ask for a lawyer in their Department to give it further consideration. Indeed, leading counsel will often take a preliminary view and ask junior counsel to check it out. I am not resiling from or trying to shed responsibility—

Mr. Garnier: You are.

The Solicitor-General: No, I am not trying to shed responsibility. I am trying to explain the procedures. I hope that they will lead the House to reflect on and accept the fact that I acted in good faith and with due diligence, and that the interests of the child were not harmed, although there are some further issues that we need to consider in relation to the contempt proceedings and the relationship between Members of this House and our constituents.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I am sorry for any personal embarrassment that has been caused to my right hon. and learned Friend, as she does an excellent job in her post, and long may that continue. However, it occurs to me that the review of the criminal cases and the investigations of the decided family cases that are going on at the moment will put a lot of Departments and other organisations into a position of some conflict and doubt about whether to respond to the requests for information for the review and investigation, and about their duties under contempt of court rules. I wonder what the position is in terms of the Government requesting information or somebody else, such as the courts, giving some absolute advice to people so that that can be clear. Beyond that, I wonder whether this is a passing phase to do with the investigations following the Cannings decision or whether, bearing in mind that the Children Bill has just started its progress in the other place, a more general application needs to be considered for inclusion in that Bill before it makes it on to the statute book.

The Solicitor-General: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. There are more general issues that need reflection and consideration. Whether they need a statutory amendment to children's legislation is not at all clear, but I think that further consideration is needed. He is right that we want to be sure that Ministers in other Departments and, indeed, Members of this House are in no doubt about the position when people come to see them, particularly if they have seen reports of such judgments. We do not want anybody to be in any doubt about whether they can carry out their duties by proceeding to discuss a case, or whether they would be in breach of contempt rules.

I hope that the House will find it helpful if I offer to consider how we think about clarifying the situation. It is an issue not only for Ministers, but for Members in general. Perhaps, as I am fully respectful of the long years of experience of the shadow Attorney-General, I will offer to consult him, and he can help us to ensure that we have an agreed position that everybody in this House can be clear about, as they should be able to feel certain of their duties to their constituents and their duty to obey the law.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Solicitor-General accept the traditional doctrine of ministerial responsibility, under which Ministers are responsible for the advice that they take and are therefore obliged and have an incentive to probe, question and validate that advice? Or is she joining the long list of Ministers who seem to be enunciating a new doctrine under which, if the advice proves correct and successful, Ministers take responsibility, but if it does not do so, they invoke an official and point the finger at them?

The Solicitor-General: I have never been in any doubt—and I think that the Law Officers are in a particular position on this—that responsibility lies not with the adviser, even where that adviser is the Law Officer, but with the person who is taking the decision. In this case, the person who was taking the decision was me, and I take responsibility for it. I simply described to the House, in the way in which I described it to the local authority and the court, what the process was.

I want to be clear that I take responsibility for the actions that I took. There was nothing improper about the actions that I took. The court has no criticism of me or of the actions that I took, and I do take responsibility for them. I do not want the House to be left with the idea that my explanation of the background to my actions was somehow a denial of responsibility. I accept responsibility, and no harm was done.

One of the things that I would be very concerned about and would regret would be if the excellent work of the legal secretariat to the Law Officers, which has served Law Officers down the decades excellently and with a high degree of professionalism, somehow was criticised as a result of what has happened. The Attorney-General, Lord Goldsmith, and I value most highly the work of the legal secretariat of the Law Officers, which is recognised throughout the profession as providing the highest quality legal advice.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Although I am rather late in the day, may I congratulate the Solicitor-General on the blow that she struck 25 years ago by breaking the barrier of contempt of court, which was a real obstacle to freedom of information in those days? I congratulate her on that and I am sorry not to have done so earlier.

May I also congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on her wisdom in taking a second opinion and not relying solely on her own legal advice in making the decision? May I deplore the criticism that has been levelled at her when she has asked to come to the House and explain how the decision was taken? If she did not explain that she had taken advice and how it turned out, she would have been heavily criticised for not mentioning it. No doubt, she would also have been belaboured for taking the decision on her own. May I congratulate her, as she did absolutely the right thing?

May I express very briefly my sympathy with anyone who finds themselves in the complicated, multi-layered depths of contempt of court? It is often very hard to know where the public interest lies in that sector, and frankly that whole area of law needs urgent review.

Further to the comments of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), I have certainly seen a letter from the Law Society suggesting that it is considering writing to all its family practitioners inviting them to review their files to see whether there is a case to be brought out and put into this whole area of review. Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the Law Society is going to write to all family solicitors inviting them to submit cases for review, and is that being done with the encouragement of her Department or the Minister for Children?

The Solicitor-General: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for the points that she made. Issues have arisen around the edges of the case that require further review, and I am aware of those that the Solicitors Family Law Association and the Law Society have been looking at.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The Solicitor-General suggested that we should broaden consideration of the problem, particularly as a reference in the press suggested that a Member of Parliament could be in contempt of court if a constituent brings an issue to him. In reality, as she said, most Members of Parliament will deal with cases, from both men and women, which go on to the family division. I dealt with one case in which fighting had been going on for two years—not with the courts but with the evidence given by social services to the courts. Ultimately, a guardian ad litem was appointed for court proceedings, which confirms that the guidance I was given was correct. It is important that the right of the citizen to see their Member of Parliament as an ombudsman is maintained.

The Solicitor-General: I am sure that we all want to be reassured that citizens maintain the right to meet their Members of Parliament, tell them what has been going on in a case that affects their life profoundly and, if they want the opportunity, to protest to them and ask for something to be done. Of course, we all want to be absolutely clear that we are sticking to the letter of the law. I suspect that custom and practice operates when a Member writes to social services on behalf of a constituent, as the hon. Gentleman may have done, and asks for background to the case. However, if such information consists of issues that have formed the background to court proceedings that custom and practice may not be within the strict letter of the law. We have to be absolutely sure about that—we do not want to invite social services to break the law in communicating with MPs; we do not want to give comfort to constituents but at the same time breach the law; and we do not want to break the law in anything that we do in the House or debates. We need to discuss the issues of principle and we need to support our constituents. When we discuss those issues, it will assist us to have an understanding of the way in which the courts deal with those issues in practice.

Points of Order

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This afternoon, in Prime Minister's questions, the Deputy Prime Minister accused the deputy Leader of the Opposition of hypocrisy. May I draw your attention to column 1603 of the Official Report on 10 March 2004? In a debate on the Justice (Northern Ireland) Bill, one of my hon. Friends was called to order by the Deputy Speaker for accusing another hon. Member of hypocrisy. I know that you wish to protect and uphold the rights of Back Benchers, and would not wish to have two sets of rules in the House for Front Benchers and Back Benchers. Will you therefore give a ruling on whether it is unparliamentary for one hon. Member to accuse another of hypocrisy, regardless of whether they are a Front-Bench or Back-Bench Member of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: I always say to the House that temperate language should be used at all times, and it is unfortunate if it is not. Whether Members are Front Benchers or Back Benchers, all are hon. Members and are treated the same. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that I have no fear about whether the Member concerned holds high office—they will abide by the rules of the House.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In that case, the Back-Bench Member was asked to withdraw their comments, but today the Front-Bench Member was not.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Deputy Speaker was more attentive than I was today, but the hon. Gentleman will know that Prime Minister's Question Time—whether questions are fielded by the Prime Minister or by the Deputy Prime Minister—is a heated time of the week and I have many things to watch out for. I would put it down to that.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is there not a distinction between referring directly to an hon. Member and accusing them of being a hypocrite, which you would rightly rule out of order, and making a general criticism that the Opposition's position is hypocritical?

Mr. Robinson: That is not the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe). I have been able to answer the other points of order. There is a distinction—he is quite right—[Interruption.] Order. I know what hon. Members are asking, and I think that I have given as good an explanation as I can.

Restricted Byways

1.5 pm

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make new provision about establishing the existence of byways open to all traffic.

I want to make it clear at the outset that the Bill is not about banning things but about clarification of the law. Many in the House relish the countryside and its beauty. I have two areas of outstanding natural beauty in my constituency: the Dorset AONB and Cranborne Chase, and West Wiltshire Downs AONB, which also covers the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who is present. My Bill is about co-existence in the countryside. I have been accused of being anti-biker and anti-four-wheel drive, but it is not my intention in the Bill to be anti-anything of that nature. I want to defend the rights of horse-riders, walkers, hikers, and genuine users of the countryside—people who have traditionally used it in certain ways, particularly those who have experienced peaceful enjoyment along green lanes, bridleways and footpaths.

There is still room in the countryside for people who want to ride their motorbikes and trailbikes, and who want to drive their four-wheel vehicles. Yesterday, I discussed the Bill with someone outside the House who asked, "What about the new souped-up tractors that people are driving in the countryside?" Some of the Bill's provisions will cover that, as it would create a framework for co-existence in the countryside.

The Government have already issued a consultation document on the subject, "The Use of Mechanically Propelled Vehicles on Rights of Way". I am delighted that the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality is on the Government Front Bench, because I want to make particular reference to the fourth proposal in the document, which says:

"We propose to introduce legislation, which will make it no longer possible to establish the existence of a byway open to all traffic by reference to historic (pre-commencement) use by, or other evidence relating to, non-mechanically propelled vehicles"— probably a horse and cart. However, it also says:

"We propose to do this by introducing a cut-off date after which (subject to certain exceptions) any unrecorded rights of way for vehicles shall be recorded as restricted byways in the definitive map and statement.

We propose that the cut-off date should be one year from the commencement of the new legislation."

The cut-off date is a problem, which is why I am moving the Bill now, rather than waiting.

In a letter that I received earlier this month from the leader of Dorset county council, Mr. Tim Palmer, he stated that he has forwarded to me a letter that he had written to a committee considering the consultation on opening a byway to all traffic in the county. He writes:

"You will see that all the evidence allowable under the current law is in favour of a byway"

open to all traffic. He goes on:

"Everyone is now looking to your Bill to give them a voice and to add to the clamour for a change in the law. One aspect you may want to cover is the retrospective review of existing byways. This is not allowed for in the Government's consultation paper. Because of this the TRF,"—

the Trail Riders Fellowship—

"4WD clubs etc are rushing to claim more byways before the legislation comes in. In addition we do need to be able to review the status of some ancient byways, national monuments like the Ridgeway and the Oxdrove through this constituency, both currently completely wrecked by swarms of bikes, quads and 4WDs."

This is not solely a Dorset issue. It has great support across the House. Early-day motion 380 dealing with the use of unsurfaced byways open to all traffic was tabled by the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) and signed by 90 other hon. Members. It particularly mentions the Ridgeway. In my constituency, there is a bridleway—bridleway 17—emanating from the village of Cranborne. Last June I had to attend a public meeting in the village. The 300 people who had gathered were very concerned about bikers using the bridleway—not local people using it for their enjoyment, but people who had travelled almost 100 miles because it was considered a good place to ride their bike, particularly when it had been raining and the bridleway was rather muddy. There was talk of biking groups that came regularly from Bristol, Southampton and so on.

I know that my proposal has the support of the British Horse Society, the Ramblers Association and the Green Lanes Environmental Action Movement, but I also want the support of the Trail Riders Fellowship and an organisation of four-wheel drivers in my constituency called—perhaps slightly incorrectly—the Friends of Dorset Rights of Way, who have written to me on several occasions suggesting that we should find a form of co-existence.

So what will my Bill do? It will state that when a county council or other body responsible for rights of way is considering an application for a green lane, or whatever it is, to be designated as a byway open to all traffic, if the evidence is solely that 100 or 150 years ago the byway was used by a horse and cart, the council will be able to protect the rights of existing users of that byway—the riders and the walkers—as well as look after the access for farmers and for others to open spaces beyond the byway. The council should be able to protect the rights of the disabled, who may well need to use four-wheel drive vehicles to get to the open spaces beyond the byway.

The Bill would give the county council rights of way committee the powers to designate a byway as a restricted byway, and to consider the rights and responsibilities of those with mechanically propelled vehicles—the trailbikes, the four-wheel drives and so on—and to make sure that those rights are not jeopardised. Laying down specific rights should be a matter of local decision for local people exercised by their local authority. By creating a byway known as a restricted byway, we can balance the needs and rights of all the users of the countryside.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Robert Walter, Sir George Young, Jeremy Corbyn, Sandra Gidley, Mr. James Gray, Mr. Robert Key, Mr. David Drew, Mr. Anthony Steen and Mr. John Randall.

RESTRICTED BYWAYS

Mr. Robert Walter accordingly presented a Bill to make new provision about establishing the existence of byways open to all traffic: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 July, and to be printed [Bill 80].

Opposition Day

[7TH ALLOTTED DAY—FIRST PART]

Post Office Services

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House believes that all Post Office customers who wish to continue receiving their benefits, pension payments and tax credits through the Post Office should be able to do so through a Post Office Card Account opened at the counter of a Post Office or sub-post office; notes that the Government has encouraged Post Office customers to use their own bank accounts or basic bank accounts, whilst preventing the promotion of the Post Office Card Account; further believes that the Government should use the roll out of Direct Payment to encourage the take-up of all benefits and tax credits; calls on the Government to clarify urgently how housebound, disabled and older people who are not able to cope with the three direct payment options will be able to claim their pensions and benefits after 2005; recognises the significant role played by local post offices in both rural and urban areas; appreciates that ending cash benefit payments will deprive sub-postmasters of an average of 35 per cent. of their income; notes that this will make many post offices commercially unviable and is likely to lead to yet further closures; further calls on the Government to ensure that the urban post office closure programme is conducted systematically and only after consulting all relevant parties including Post Office users; and condemns the Government's failure to deliver benefits and tax credits in a simple, easy to understand manner while at the same time jeopardising the future prosperity of the Post Office.

The motion reflects a widespread belief not just among those on the Opposition Benches but in all parts of the House about the importance of post offices as part of the local community. We have deep concerns about the long-term viability of the post office network under the Government's approach. Those concerns were powerfully expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) in the debate in the House on 13 January. That debate focused on the post office network and the importance of sustaining it and investing in it. Today I shall consider the post office network from the point of view of the people who use it—from the demand side, rather than the supply side. I shall consider the point of view of benefit claimants and the pensioners whom we represent, who wish to have access to a viable post office and to claim their benefits in a way with which they are long familiar and comfortable.

Although it is always good to see the Secretary of State in the Chamber, it is a great pity that she was not present for the debate on 13 January, which was about her responsibilities for support for post offices. Today, even though we are talking about services for benefit claimants, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is not present. I regret that, because I want to consider the crisis in our post offices from the point of view of those claiming benefits, many of whom are very unhappy with the Government's approach.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): May I tell my hon. Friend about Belper? Under the reinvention programme, which seems to be more like a programme of mass destruction, of the five post offices that were opened in Belper, four were closed. We were assured that the one remaining post office would be able to cope, but last week there was absolute chaos in it. When the Government made a commitment to allow people to collect their benefits, they did not say that they would make it impossible for them to do so—but that is just what they have done.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend reflects the views of many constituents across the country who face practical problems that give the lie to some of the complacent assurances that we received from Ministers. The Trade and Industry Committee report "People, Pensions and Post Offices" contains powerful evidence about the scale of the problem that our post offices face and confirms why we are right to press for the right of people to choose how they receive their benefits. Paragraph 12 of the report states that the "old" system—the so-called old system—

"offered the choice between a bank or building society account or an order book for use at a post office to collect benefits and pensions. Direct Payment essentially offers the choice between a bank or building society account which may or may not be usable at a post office, or the Post Office card account, but not the order book. It is difficult to see that customer choice has, in practice, been extended significantly. Offering the full range of customer choice would entail allowing those who wish to persist with the order book system to do so."

The Opposition are committed to the order book system as an option not because we are retro or old-fashioned, but because we believe in choice. If there are millions of people in Britain, including many pensioners, whose choice it is to use such a system, why should the Government try to deprive them of the choice that they reasonably wish to exercise?

People are right to be wary of some of the options that are in front of them instead. I shall quote the experience of a constituent of mine—Mrs. Mortain, who lives in Havant—whose case I have heard about literally in the last few days; I have her permission to do so. She has been receiving her pension via her bank account, in exactly the way that Ministers are trying to encourage, but she has not received a bank payment for the past five weeks. They have suddenly ceased. She got on to the Pension Service and it told her that it is currently experiencing what it called and that hundreds of others are affected.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry may not be able to respond to this, but I hope that in the winding-up speech of the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), we will learn whether he is aware of problems in delivering pension payments into bank accounts, and whether my constituent is not alone and there is a glitch in the system affecting many others. It has reached the stage where the Pension Service is saying, "The only way we can get you the money is to issue you with a giro cheque that you can cash at your local post office." That will be the fallback when computerised payments to bank accounts have not worked. Is that not why so many pensioners do not trust the Government's assurances on payment in other ways?

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): That news will be of great concern to old people in Reigate, where three post offices have been closed—in fact, the latest one is closing on Saturday—and they are left with the main post office in Reigate, which is hosted by Safeway. Morrisons, which is taking over Safeway, has been quite unable to provide me with any reassurance that the post office will stay open. Meanwhile, the Post Office is pressing ahead with closing the branch in Holmesdale road. It is a dreadful state of affairs if it cannot guarantee to pay people their money. The reinvention programme should be stopped immediately until the matter can be sorted out.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He rightly draws my attention to the fact that, given all the changes in the world of supermarkets at the moment—in my constituency, Tesco has just taken over our local one-stop shop—many of the established arrangements for post offices in such shops are in question. That is another source of uncertainty and instability. I hope again that we will hear from the Secretary of State about what steps she is taking given that significant communities—towns—face the uncertainty that my hon. Friend describes.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept that a great deal of insult seems to be added to injury when post offices are closed in the circumstances that he has just articulated, because of the mechanistic and formulaic way in which the Post Office goes about closing them? In Bexhill, three post offices have closed, yet when I have tried to make representations, I have received only a computer-manufactured letter, and even when errors in the reply have been pointed out, I have merely received a further computer-generated letter.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is quite right. One problem with the so-called consultation is that it is not real. Instead, we have something of which the Government have made rather a speciality: bogus consultation during which one never gets the sense that one is receiving a genuine, individual letter or that any response will be properly assessed by an individual. The Opposition wish to respect the views of the people whom we represent—the pensioners and the many people claiming benefits. We are in favour of choice and in favour of the customer. That is the philosophy that underpins our approach to the Post Office.

There is further evidence in the direct-payment statistics produced by the Department for Work and Pensions about what people prefer. They show the responses that it has had when it has invited benefit claimants to convert to the new payment systems. We see from the latest statistics that it has so far approached approximately 2.5 million pensioners, of whom 1.9 million have responded. Of those 1.9 million responses, only about 750,000 have said, "Here are my bank account details; of course you can pay my money into my bank account." Some 1.2 million people have said that they want a Post Office card account. Similarly, with regard to Jobcentre Plus, 2.5 million letters have been sent out, eliciting 1.3 million responses. Of those, about 800,000 have said, "Here are my bank account details", and 600,000 have asked for a Post Office card account.

The Department's latest statistics show that we have already had 2.5 million requests for a Post Office card account. The Government's limit was to be 3 million, and they have already received 2.5 million, so does the Secretary of State accept that their statistics are, first, evidence of a widespread preference for a Post Office card account rather than bank account, and secondly, very different from the Government's forecast? In the light of that clear evidence about what real people in the real world prefer, what is her new forecast for the use of the Post Office card account?

The evidence about people's preferences is even more powerful in the light of the clear bias at every stage in the system against people having a Post Office card account. Those people have expressed their preferences for Post Office card accounts despite every attempt by the system to push them in a very different direction.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, even after the initial stages, the procedure for obtaining a card account is complex and difficult for many elderly people?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct, and that is a point to which I will turn in a moment.

The evidence of the bias in the system that I was about to cite is from a report in The Sunday Telegraph of 7 March, in which a member of the DWP staff quoted an instruction received from head office, which is devastating evidence that the Government have not stood by their assurances that there will be equity and fairness in the system. The instruction states:

> "We need to pay most of these customers into bank accounts which cost 1p rather than into Post Office card accounts which cost up to 30 times more. You should be aiming to get 9 out of 10 new claimants (to use) bank accounts, with a small proportion paid through Post Office card accounts."

That was the aim set for benefit claimants. I hope that either the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary will say whether that is an accurate record of instructions sent out by the Department.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): Is the hon. Gentleman being disingenuous? Does he understand that people who seek work need to be job-ready, and that the Post Office card account, although it has many favourable characteristics, does not allow the payment of wages into it? Does he not, therefore, understand that it would be quite irresponsible for Jobcentre Plus to advise people to take out a Post Office card account, which would not leave them job-ready? May I underline the fact that the 3 million figure is not a limit on the number of Post Office card accounts? We have never said that there is a limit. If people want the Post Office card account, they can have it.

Mr. Willetts: Was the 3 million figure a forecast then? The Government themselves put that figure into circulation, so if it is no longer accurate, what is their forecast? Not only the Opposition but many people working for the Post Office would wish to know where the Government think things now stand. Of course I accept the Minister's point about wishing people to be job-ready, but assurances have been given that the system will not be biased. Nevertheless, the evidence is that it is biased, and the Minister has just cited a reason why it should be so. That is a very different position from the one that they have taken so far.

Mr. Pond: The system is not biased. It is a matter of choice for the customer. Customers must know their full range of choices, and that is what we provide. It is not for the Government or the Opposition to tell people whether they should have a Post Office card account, a current account, a basic account or a building society account. It is for the customer to decide and it is our responsibility to ensure that they fully understand their options.

Mr. Willetts: It is, of course, for the customer to decide, and that is what we believe. Contrary to the claim made by the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), that the Government allow the customer to decide, we all know that they are trying to push customers in one direction rather than the other. All we are asking him to do is to ensure that the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Work and Pensions stand by their assurances that all they are doing is extending choice. Conservative Members want to see fair and open choice, which is not available at the moment.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister is talking nonsense? I visited 28 post offices last summer, and I shall briefly quote three postmasters. The first said:

"The Benefits Agency is bullying people to change. The Government has not been fair."

The second said:

"The Benefits Agency has been very difficult. The forms are designed not to help."

The third said:

"The initial letters give a clear idea that customers must go direct. They are misleading. The bank section is deliberately put before the card section."

The Minister should apologise.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. His point is repeated by Labour Back Benchers in early-day motion 648, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty). Many hon. Members support early-day motion 648, which recognises the problem—we can all see the problem, our constituents experience it and people who run post offices are concerned about it. It is not good enough for the Minister to come to the House and say that the system is fair and even—it is not, and that is the nature of the problem.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): One of the things that most concerns pensioners in my constituency, where Ash Vale Station and Mytchett post offices have closed, is that if they even inquire about the system, as a result of Government instructions, their inquiry is treated as a request for automatic payment. That is part of the Government's dishonesty. Does my hon. Friend recognise that one of the problems is that the Government are not putting any pressure on the many banks and financial institutions that will not allow cheques to be cashed at post office counters? Only three of the banks currently allow their cheques to be cashed in that way. Does my hon. Friend agree that all banks should allow cheques to be cashed at all post office counters, which would reintroduce footfall into post offices and help sub-post offices to survive?

Mr. Willetts: Both my hon. Friend's points are absolutely right. First, we are all concerned about the insidious process whereby people are pushed towards the bank account option rather than the Post Office card account at every stage. Secondly, Conservative Members do not want to subsidise post offices; all we want is people to enter post offices because that is the service they want to use. We seek increased footfall, which is the best way to ensure that as many post offices as possible are viable in the future.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the Work and Pensions Committee visited the telephone call centre for the Pension Service last year? We were shown the script that the call centre operators use when new pensioners request a pension. The script made it clear that the Post Office card account is the last option. Does my hon. Friend think that it would be useful if the Minister were to ensure that a copy of that script is placed in the Library?

Mr. Willetts: Yes. I recall that that important point came up in the Select Committee, where my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) does sterling work. Yet again, the evidence that the system is biased is building up. All we are asking for is fairness for the millions of people who want their benefit to continue to be paid at the post office, which is not too much to ask of the Minister.

Mr. Pond: The House will have noted the hon. Gentleman's statement that the Opposition do not want to subsidise post offices. Are the Opposition confirming their opposition to the Government's £2 billion investment in the post office network? I shall quote Postwatch research—the research was conducted on a small scale, but it was, nevertheless, conducted by Postwatch—to those hon. Members who suggest that the process is biased to encourage people in one way or another. The vast majority of pensioners said that advice from the customer conversion centre

"was given in a clear and unbiased manner".

Mr. Willetts: I began my speech by saying how much I regret the absence of the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions to answer on behalf of the benefits system, which is why we called the debate. The junior Work and Pensions Minister has intervened on me three times, but so far we have heard nothing from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry did not turn up when we debated the issue from the point of view of the post office network, and now she is silent when we discuss the subject from the point of view of the claimant—instead, it is a Minister who has intervened.

[Mr. Willetts]

My response to the Minister's challenge is to examine the seven-stage process to open a Post Office card account, which clearly shows the bias:

"1. Wait for the letter from the Pension Service or the DWP saying your benefit will in future be paid direct.

2. call the helpline number on the letter and say you want a post office card account

3. the DWP then will send you a 'Personal Invitation Document' to open an account

4. This document must be taken to your local Post Office. They will give you an application form".

By stage four, one has obtained an application form.

"5. That application form must be filled in and handed back to the Post Office

6. The Post Office will then post you two letters—one containing your PIN, the other called a Pick Up Notice

7. The Pick Up Notice must be taken to the local Post Office to collect your card. The account is then activated."

That is not skilled mass marketing. The system has not been designed to be customer friendly in order to maximise people's opportunities to obtain Post Office card accounts. The process contains a set of bureaucratic hurdles that are designed to put off the millions of people who want to receive their payments at the post office.

Mr. Weir: The hon. Gentleman missed out a stage. After the form has been taken to the post office, one must obtain information from the post office to fill in on the original letter from the Pension Service, and return that letter to the Pension Service before the account is activated.

Mr. Willetts: I am happy to be corrected by the hon. Gentleman, and I apologise to the House for having made the system sound simpler than it really is.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is right that it is difficult to open those accounts. I draw his attention to the fact that if an elderly person writes outside the correct box when they fill in the form, the whole form is rejected. As he says, the system is biased against the Post Office card account.

Mr. Willetts: The problems with the computer recognition system form a whole subject, and there have been many such cases. One gentleman wrote his sevens in the continental style—Conservative Members do not object to the continental method of writing seven—and the computer could not recognise them, so his benefit claim could not be processed, which is not a good way to operate.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman may know that I am a member of the Select Committee that made some observations about the complexity surrounding the Post Office card account. Given what he said about order books, does he want to improve the Post Office card account or does he want to abolish it?

Mr. Willetts: I do not want to abolish the Post Office card account—we accept that we are too far down the track for that. We want a user-friendly system that allows people to choose a Post Office card account, which is a way to maximise footfall through the post office. In a moment, I shall turn to the important subject of the exception service, which is needed to supplement the Post Office card account.

Richard Burden: I want to clarify the Conservative policy. The hon. Gentleman says he wants to improve the Post Office card account system, but he has not said that he wants to return to an order book system.

Mr. Willetts: The Post Office card account does need to be improved, but I am also talking about the form that the exceptions service should take.

I intended to cite evidence from a range of charities about the problems involved in opening a Post Office card account, but so many of my hon. Friends have intervened with evidence of their own that I need not detain the House with it, save to quote Age Concern, which says in an appendix to the Select Committee report:

"We are concerned at the considerable hurdles that seem to be being put in the way of opening a POCA. One cannot simply go to a Post Office and open an account."

The Secretary of State must tackle that fundamental charge regarding the bias in the system.

Does the Secretary of State recognise the problems that particular groups face? We have all heard sad stories about the problems that many disabled people have experienced when using the new post office devices. It is a sad irony that the House is finally considering the draft Disability Discrimination Bill at the same time as the Government are introducing a measure that is the most hostile to disabled people, and in respect of which their interests and views have been least well considered, in many years of public policy. The Secretary of State knows about the problems, because the Government have already had to admit that the PIN machine will have to be changed. Some people find it difficult to reach the keypad and others—for example, blind and visually impaired people—find it difficult to manipulate. Will the Secretary of State tell the House where the redesign of the keypad stands and when we will see the user-friendly keypads in our post offices for which many disabled users are crying out?

The Secretary of State must deal with the problem of multiple users, which arises where, for example, claimants are housebound and receive support from carers and social services. In an ideal world, those people might have one carer or social services support worker who is with them all the time, but, sadly, it is not like that in the real world. Many of our housebound constituents face an ever-changing cast of support workers coming to their houses to assist them, which makes it very difficult for them to access the system that has been designed by Ministers and the Post Office. Citizens Advice says:

"Direct payment will bring few advantages to claimants who need someone else to collect their benefit for them, or to help them operate an ATM or pinpad. This is a significant issue that needs a solution".

It believes that in order to resolve such practical problems, the DWP should allow housebound people and those who cannot cope with a PIN to choose the exceptions service as their normal method of payment and that it should be accessible for claimants who do not have a permanent collector.

I do not blame the DTI for failing to understand this, but I do blame the DWP—after all, it is responsible for delivering benefits and should understand claimants' needs—for failing to put up the Secretary of State to respond to the debate and for failing to ensure that such problems were tackled as the system was being designed. I am afraid that that has done much damage to the Department's reputation for understanding the needs of disabled or housebound people.

In response, the Government have proposed an exceptions service. I should be grateful if the Secretary of State could give us some reliable information about how that will work. So far, Ministers have failed to inspire confidence when offering us assurances about that. The Minister for Pensions sounded like Corporal Jones from "Dad's Army" when he told the Select Committee on Trade and Industry:

"The advice to people at the moment is do not panic."

I am afraid that that is not good enough as a piece of serious ministerial advice on how the new exceptions service will work. The only response to, "'Do not panic', says Minister" is, "Panic!". He advised people to hold on to their pension books and not to worry. He also said that the exceptions service is not being offered as a "fourth option"—in other words, that it is not an option for anyone dissatisfied with the other three options. Will the Secretary of State tell us more about who will be able to access it, on what terms they will access it, and for how long they will have to wait?

The Select Committee's report is highly condemnatory on this point. It states:

"It is clear from the evidence presented to us that the failure of the DWP to develop its ideas for the Exceptions Service in advance of the introduction of Direct Payments has led to uncertainty and confusion over the means by which some groups of disabled people will receive their benefits in future. At the very least, the Government should take steps to allay their concerns by making clear that claimants do have the choice of continuing to use order books until 2005 or until such time as the Exceptions Service has been developed."

There is widespread concern about this issue, and I hope that the Secretary of State will deal with it.

Standing back from this individual disaster, we see a wider picture of a catalogue of problems and failures going right back to the original decision in 1999 to abandon the Horizon project and go for this option instead. I think we all know what happened then. Ministers thought to themselves, "There is this hidden subsidy coming into the Post Office from the benefits system. We can save money by paying the benefits in a different way and we will remove the hidden subsidy for post offices." That is what they thought they were doing. Instead, they have ended up putting even more money into post offices than they would otherwise have had to, because they have taken away the footfall of benefits claimants, while finding that many benefits claimants are deeply distressed because they have been unable to continue with the reliable system for claiming their benefits. During those five years, the Government have not taken us forward—instead, they have managed to perform the extraordinary double trick of weakening our post offices and leaving many people who wish to claim benefits with a less adequate system than they had before.

This is a classic example of a failure of public policy; yet another example of this Government's failure to deliver; and, even more significantly, a failure to understand the needs of millions of people, especially elderly people, who wish to carry on being paid in the same reliable way. [Interruption.] The Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is giggling. I have to tell him that it is no accident that this policy was decided in 1999. If we date it from the geological fault lines of this Labour Government, it is a classic "cool Britannia, modernising Britain" policy, which says, "Let's get rid of the old order books: we're going to have spanking new systems and gleaming new technology." It is a classic example of a policy cooked up by people who had no understanding of the views of disabled people or of pensioners. It comes from the time when the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said that what he really thought about pensioners was that there was "no mileage" to be had from them, and when the chairman of the Labour party denounced them as "racist", then, as a final insult, as "predominantly Conservative". That is why they took no account of the interests of the many people using the post office, and that is why it is Conservative Members who are pressing for their interests today.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"supports the Government's strategy to modernise the way benefits and pensions are paid, and to provide customers with a choice of accounts; welcomes the fact that with Direct Payment customers will still be able to collect their cash from the Post Office if they wish using a current account or basic bank account with Post Office access or the Post Office Card Account; notes the Government's plans for a cheque payment, cashable at post offices, for people who cannot be paid through an account; recognises that Direct Payment is a more modern, efficient and secure method of payment which will also help increase financial inclusion; welcomes the fact that more customers are now paid through an account than by order book without problems, including nearly six million pensioners; notes the previous government's attempt to introduce a Benefit Payment Card, which wasted millions of pounds of tax-payers' money; notes the fact that the Post Office had not until recently kept up with changes in customer demand and so had seen transaction volumes dropping and losses increasing; recognises the need for change and congratulates the Government for taking decisive action to help turn the business around; welcomes the record £2 billion investment in the Post Office network over a five-year period, including £450 million for the rural network and £210 million to modernise the urban network; and believes that this will help ensure a viable Post Office network that people will want to use."

I am delighted to join the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) in a debate entitled "Post Office Services", and to respond to his opening speech. As Secretary of State, with the privilege of being shareholder on behalf of the public in the Royal Mail and in Post Office Ltd., I regard it as entirely appropriate that I should have this opportunity to respond to his increasingly absurd statements.

Let me first deal with the issue of benefit payments and the shift to direct payment that is taking place. The hon. Gentleman talks about choice. He appears to have ignored everything that has been happening about customers making their own choices over the past decade and more. For many years, well ahead of the decision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions to switch to making all payments by direct credit, more than half of benefit recipients were already having their benefits cash paid directly into their bank accounts.

Let me underline that point by saying that nearly two thirds of recipients of child benefit and nearly six out of 10 new pensioners already get their benefits paid directly into their bank accounts. Those claimants and customers are exercising choice, yet we heard nothing about them from the hon. Member for Havant.

Gregory Barker: The Secretary of State makes great play of the issue of choice, but where is the choice for my constituents who want to use a post office in their village, but find it closed?

Ms Hewitt: I shall come to post office closures in a moment, but if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I want to start with the issue with which the hon. Member for Havant started—benefits payments and the introduction of the Post Office card account. Let us remember that the Government of whom he was a member introduced their own plan for a benefit payment card. It was supposed to use the latest technology of the time, and it was part of a public-private partnership. When we came into office in 1997, we discovered that their benefit payment card programme was a shambles. It was well overdue, the technology was not working—because the programme was so overdue, that technology was also out of date—and the costs were overrunning.

We spent a year and a half trying to make that programme work. In the end, however, we decided that there was no point in rescuing that absurd out-of-date Conservative proposition for a benefit payment card. Instead, we invested the best part of £500 million in the Horizon platform—on which I shall elaborate in a moment—which forms the basis for universal banking, which is extending the benefits of banking and financial inclusion to millions of people.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): If the right hon. Lady wants to extend universal banking to all people, why cannot the job-ready unemployed have their wages paid into one of those accounts?

Ms Hewitt: Because the card account was never designed to do the entire job of a bank account. Basic bank accounts and regular cheque accounts are available for people to have their wages paid into; the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) has already dealt with that point.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that I was not the only Member who went to see ICL to talk about the Horizon system, which came out of the ideas of the previous Conservative Government. When I did so, ICL made it clear to me that the system was full of capability but was being underused. It was also made clear that there was a need to invest in it because it was going to be the saviour of the Post Office. Will my right hon. Friend point out to all concerned that that was the clear message? The Opposition do not seem to be able to remember that.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right, and I am grateful to him for making that important point. Thanks to the investment and the decisions that we have made, the Horizon platform and the automation of the post offices have now modernised post offices to enable them to offer new banking services to millions of customers who did not previously use the post office. That is extremely important.

We are now phasing out the order book system. It is out of date, and it uses systems that, frankly, belong to the era of the ration book. It is inefficient, costly to administer, and open to fraud and abuse. That is why we were right to decide to phase it out and extend benefit claimants' choice, which includes maintaining and strengthening choice for claimants who wish to get their benefits in cash at a post office.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend said, the order book system is open to fraud and abuse. Will she confirm that 100 pensioners a week have their order books stolen?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right—and that is a disaster for the individual pensioners who are robbed, with all the distress that that entails. It is also enormously costly to the taxpayer, who has to foot the bill for this kind of fraud. I would have expected the hon. Member for Havant, who is so against waste and inefficiency in the public sector, to support rather than oppose our efforts to get rid of a system that makes elderly people and taxpayers vulnerable.

Our commitment to financial inclusion, universal banking and the introduction of the Post Office card account has been welcomed by Citizens Advice, Mind and Help the Aged. Indeed, Citizens Advice's excellent recent study on financial inclusion stated:

"The government, the banking industry and the Post Office should be commended for the progress they have made in establishing Universal Banking Services. The ambition to enable all people to own the most basic of financial services—a bank account—is one we share."

I commend Citizens Advice on the way in which it has helped us to put universal banking in place.

Mr. Blunt: I am pretty certain that, having seen the post offices at St. John's, Lesbourne road and now Holmesdale road close, and with a threat hanging over the main post office in Reigate, Citizens Advice and Help the Aged would be less than impressed by the accessibility of post office services to the elderly in my constituency. Those closures are happening at exactly the same time as the Government are going through the automation process. The conjunction of those two things, plus the £50,000 incentive to sub-postmasters to take their businesses out of service—which places them in an impossible position—is causing a collapse in the availability of services in Reigate and elsewhere. It was the concern about all those issues that generated the petition that was presented to me by hundreds of my constituents this morning.

Ms Hewitt: I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman and his party want to go back to the days of the Conservative Government, when post offices were closing in their hundreds and thousands in an entirely unplanned and unmanaged way, partly because, with fewer customers cashing benefit cheques at post offices, it was simply not possible for sub-postmasters to make a decent living. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that people should be forced to carry on in businesses that are no longer viable.

I shall return to the issue of urban reinvention in a moment, but I want to deal first with the series of allegations made by the hon. Member for Havant about the alleged difficulties involved in opening a Post Office card account. He made great play of the difficulty of the process, the seventh and eighth steps and all that nonsense. Let us be clear: there are three steps that individual claimants need to take. First, they ring the customer conversion centre. I looked extremely carefully at the script to be used there before I approved its use, to ensure that it was neutral in its presentation of the options. Secondly, they discuss the options. Thirdly, if they want to open a Post Office card account, they wait for their personal invitation document to arrive and they take it to the post office branch, where they get and complete their application form. They then send those account details back to the Department for Work and Pensions.

Andrew Selous: It is my recollection—and that of the Chairman of the Select Committee—that, when the Committee visited the new pension call centre, we found that the script was not neutral on that matter, and that the Post Office card account was very much the last option. Would the right hon. Lady agree to place that script in the Library of the House?

Ms Hewitt: I do not agree with the criticisms of the script that have been made by members of the Select Committee, but I should be happy to place it in the Library. I shall do so in the knowledge that Postwatch, which conducted some small-scale research with actual customers, has reported that almost all the pensioners to whom it spoke felt that the advice given by the customer conversion centre

"was given in a clear and unbiased manner".

Most of them described the DWP customer information material as being of "good quality", and most of the people ringing the centre had their questions answered satisfactorily. Most of those who had rung the centre to open a card account felt that the information that they had been given was "clear and unbiased", and most did not feel that staff were seeking to persuade them to choose one option over any of the others.

Mr. Paterson: I am amazed. Has the Secretary of State talked directly to any postmasters? As I said in an earlier intervention, I have visited 28, and every one said how difficult it is for people to apply for cards. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) that the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters would say that he underestimates his case. It says that there are 22 steps in the process of getting a card. When I visited the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services, taking a delegation of postmasters along, it was explained clearly to him that those who manage to get through that thicket of measures do so only with the specific help of the postmaster himself. I urge the Secretary of State to come to North Shropshire to visit some postmasters.

Ms Hewitt: The position of Conservative Members becomes more and more absurd as they keep inflating the number of steps that supposedly need to be taken. Let me stress to the hon. Gentleman that about 2 million Post Office card accounts have already been opened. That scarcely bears out the absurd allegations being made about how we are biasing the system, driving people away from the Post Office card account and making it impossible for anyone to open one. That is complete nonsense.

Mr. Willetts: The Secretary of State calls those claims absurd, but all Opposition Members know how true they are. Is she saying that the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux is absurd when it reports that "clients who want to open a Post Office card account feel that there are obstacles placed in their way . . . We consider that this process acts as a barrier to opening a card account, particularly for vulnerable people"?

That is what NACAB is saying, and that is what we all know to be the case. Why does the Secretary of State continue to deny what everybody knows to be true?

Ms Hewitt: I am going by what customers have told Postwatch and, more importantly, by the fact that about 2 million people have opened a Post Office card account. The eventual number of card accounts is expected to exceed the original operating assumption of 3 million; none of that is evidence that people are finding it hard to open an account.

The hon. Member for Havant also raised a number of important issues involving people with disabilities. The first to be raised, quite properly, was the problems that people who are blind or have difficulty in seeing have in using personal identification number pads. That issue has been recognised by the Post Office, which has already improved the PIN pad by putting a key guard over it to make it easier to use, and adding a dot to the No. 5 key. The Post Office is working with the Royal National Institute of the Blind to make further changes to the PIN pad to make it easier for that group of customers to use the system.

Mr. McLoughlin: Why was it necessary to make those changes? Why were those things not thought of in the first place?

Ms Hewitt: I agree that it would have been better if the original PIN pad had been designed with full regard to the needs of people with different disabilities. The technology is still developing, and was not available at the right price and at the right time when the service was introduced. It is being introduced now, and I pay tribute to the RNIB, which not only raised the issue, but has helped the Post Office to resolve those problems in a practical way, as we readily acknowledge.

The hon. Member for Havant also asked about people who are housebound. I think that he accepts that there is no problem for those with a regular carer who use a Post Office card account, because they will have their own PIN number. However, housebound people may have different people caring for them in different weeks. Of course that is a problem: under the existing system, the claimants can simply sign an order book counterfoil, which provides great flexibility, but I am afraid that that practice is wide open to fraud and abuse. We are saying that where claimants need people to collect their money for them, they will, for the time being, simply continue to use their order book while we work with the various organisations to design the exceptions service.

The exceptions service will be based on a cheque system, which will be much more secure than the order book system. It will be introduced and available from October this year, in plenty of time for the ending of the order book system in May next year. I am delighted to say that, exactly as we would expect, my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department for Work and Pensions and their officials have been working extremely closely with Citizens Advice, Help the Aged and many other groups representing vulnerable customers to ensure that there is full understanding of the needs of different vulnerable groups that cannot have their benefits paid directly into an account. That new system of payment by cheque will all be in place to ensure that there is no trouble in getting benefits for those vulnerable claimants.

Mr. Drew: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be useful to give Members a full briefing, given that people are likely to question us on how the system will work? Before the system goes live, will she arrange for us to see how it will operate?

Ms Hewitt: That is an excellent suggestion, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and I will ensure that such a briefing is provided.

The successful introduction of the Post Office card account is only part of a much bigger—[Laughter.] They are very slow over there this afternoon. [Interruption.] The card is extremely successful—about 2 million people have already opened a Post Office card account, because they have decided that that is what they want. However, that account, which many Opposition Members said would never see the light of day—let me remind them of that—is part of a much bigger programme of universal banking. Thanks to the £500 million investment in the Horizon platform, the Post Office can become the high street bank for millions of other bank customers.

The Post Office is providing banking services on behalf of the Alliance & Leicester, Barclays, the Co-operative bank, First Direct in Scotland, Lloyds TSB and two internet banks—Smile and Cahoot. Customers of all those banks, with their ordinary bank accounts such as cheque accounts so on, can get cash at post offices free of charge.

Mr. Alan Reid: The Secretary of State knows that she has not mentioned any of the three main Scottish banks, which means that pensioners and benefit recipients in Scotland do not have the same choice as those in other parts of the country. What progress is she making in negotiations with the three main Scottish banks to reach agreement with them?

Ms Hewitt: I am happy to say that the Scottish clearing banks and other major financial institutions, as well as those I mentioned, already provide access at post offices. Those services—for instance, access to a basic bank account—were launched on schedule on 1 April last year. Access to the other current accounts—the cheque accounts—is a matter for commercial negotiations between the Post Office and the various banks.

My point is that because of our investment in it, the Post Office can offer that service to all the commercial banks, and therefore to all their customers. It is involved in those negotiations at the moment. I have repeatedly urged all banks to provide all their customers with access to their various accounts through the post offices, but obviously that is a commercial decision for the individual banks.

The result of that programme of investment and universal banking is that there are 20 million current account customers—not Post Office card account customers, but current account customers—who can use the new electronic systems and undertake banking transactions at Post Office branches. The result of that is that since April last year there have been nearly 25 million banking transactions at post offices. That is a huge success story, which the hon. Member for Havant completely ignored. That is why Citizens Advice welcomed this expansion of banking at post offices. It is a significant step forward in financial inclusion. Above all, from the point of view of this debate, it brings more people into post offices and gives sub-postmasters a new source of revenue.

Mr. Paterson: How much income has the Post Office lost through the changes in the card payment system and how much income will be replaced by the new banking arrangements on which the Secretary of State and her colleagues—as was repeated to me when I saw the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services—are hanging so much?

Ms Hewitt: Sub-postmasters have seen a reduction in their income from benefit payments over the last 10 years and more, for the reasons that I set out earlier, as customers have moved away from that. The choice to which the hon. Gentleman is not willing to face up was to enable the process of customer choice and seize the opportunity to have a much more efficient and fraud-proof system of paying benefits, and to make post offices attractive to customers through expanding their range of products, such as financial services and so on. Alongside the decline in income from benefit claimants, we are seeing an increase, which will continue, in income from other sources, such as home insurance, travel insurance, travel exchange products and so on. All of those are hugely popular with sub-postmasters, and all provide the prospect of continuing increases in new sources of income.

Mr. Weir: The Secretary of State's vision of an integrated post office and banking system is impressive, but does she accept that there is a problem in many rural areas, because over the last two decades many banks have pulled out of rural areas and closed small branches? I cite the case of Friockheim in my constituency, where the last bank closed a few years ago. The post office has now closed, so there is neither a bank nor a post office to enable people to use any of those services.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. It is perfectly true that many of our rural communities no longer have a retail outlet, bank or post office, because none was commercially viable. I shall refer in a moment to the investment that the Department has been making to prevent all avoidable closures of rural post offices and our work with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to try to expand in new ways the availability of services for people in rural communities.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: No, I want to make progress.

I want to underline the point that there is still a view, which I regret that some sub-postmasters share, that the only way to keep post offices viable is somehow to force customers to use them by maintaining an out-of-date order book system that gives those customers no choice at all about where they get their cash. That is not the way forward for our sub-post offices. I am glad that, in its evidence to the Select Committee, Age Concern said:

"Although we are aware that a number of organisations"—

it may have been referring to the Conservative party—

"and individual sub post masters are promoting the POCA on the basis that this is the way to save the post office network, Age Concern does not subscribe to this view."

Nor do we.

That brings me to the second set of issues raised by the hon. Member for Havant and other Opposition Members, about the number of local post offices and the restructuring. We want a viable national network.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to apologise to the constituents of those Members who raised cases with the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services the last time that we debated this subject, when we said that the consultation process was a sham? He assured us that it was not. The "Westminster newsletter", which was sent out by the Post Office after he made his announcement on 5 February, referred to new developments, one of which, it said, guaranteed that the Post Office will "not make a decision until after the public consultation period"

The Minister of State's statement included the following provision:

"No contract binding on Post Office Limited is signed before the public consultation process has ended."—[Official Report, 5 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 50WS.]

That meant no binding closure on that particular post office. That proves the point that many of us made before 5 February—the whole consultation period was an absolute sham.

Ms Hewitt: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is complaining that my hon. Friend the Minister responded to the concerns raised in that debate and took full account of all the individual complaints that have been brought to him. As a result of individual complaints, where the process has apparently not been followed as it should have been, he discussed matters with David Mills, the excellent chief executive of Post Office Ltd., and put in place stronger measures to ensure that in every case, and in every part of our country, the consultation process is properly followed and the area plan is finalised only after that consultation has been finished.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): To be absolutely clear, is the Secretary of State saying that she is grateful to Her Majesty's official Opposition for the debate on 13 January, which highlighted issues on which we were supported by Members across the House, not one of whom was in favour of the Government? Do not the Opposition therefore deserve thanks for having prompted the Government to take the right decisions, which then came forth in the Minister of State's statement?

Ms Hewitt: I am congratulating my hon. Friend, who is an excellent Minister, on taking account, as he always does, of constituency issues raised by Members on both sides of the House. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would have been less churlish on that point.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for her answer. There is one group with a particular problem—those for whom the network reinvention programme and the so-called consultation and decision-making processes were already under way. It is no comfort to my constituents or those of other hon. Members to find that their consultations were so flawed that matters would be put right in future but that closures would go ahead as was clearly planned from the outset in their constituencies. Why has the Minister failed to put a halt to those processes?

Ms Hewitt: I am sure that that is a point on which my hon. Friend the Minister of State has had discussions or communication with the hon. Lady. If not, I shall ensure that he does so.

Let me stress the need for a planned reorganisation of the post office network. In the previous financial year, Post Office Ltd., not the whole of the Royal Mail, made losses of £194 million before exceptional items. In the year before that, it made losses of £163 million, and the half-year results that have just been reported show significant losses again of £91 million. What has been happening over many years is a process of completely unplanned post office closures. Indeed, the Conservative party presided over 3,500 post office closures during its period in office.

As a result of such unplanned closures, as sub-postmasters gave up the unequal struggle of trying to make a living out of too few customers, we ended up with a pattern of provision that had no basis in rational response to what customers needed. Let me give the House the example of my city, in which one post office branch, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall), has 12 other post offices within a one mile radius. Indeed, it has 15 others within a radius of 1.1 miles. That is an impossible situation, in which none of the sub-postmasters can make a decent living, none can afford to invest in their shop or post office to make it more attractive to customers, and all are chasing and competing for a hitherto dwindling band of customers. Before the Post Office began its urban reinvention programme, more than 1,000 urban post offices had at least 10 others within one mile. Either we allow that to continue and let the decline go on—which is what the Conservatives were doing, and presumably would still do today—or we face up to difficult decisions and invest to ensure a planned restructuring of the network.

The problem is not unique to the United Kingdom. Customers in developed countries all over the world have been changing their patterns of banking, using the internet more and so on. In Germany, the number of post office branches has been reduced from 30,000 to 13,000 as a consequence of changes in customer behaviour.

Richard Burden: I agree that it is vital for us to plan the changes that are necessary, but does not the way in which Post Office Ltd. is going about a number of the reorganisations fall short of expectations? In south Birmingham, for instance, the closure of 29 out of 90 sub-post offices is being suggested. Is not one of the problems the excessively inflexible view adopted by Post Office Ltd. of the assistance available to Government, which often leads it to maximise its chances of closing post offices and minimise the opportunities to create sustainable businesses? Will my right hon. Friend assure me that in future Post Office Ltd. will be encouraged to look at the opportunities for post office business, and not just the threats?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I know that he and other south Birmingham Members have been enormously active in engaging in the current consultation on the area plan with Post Office Ltd. and Postwatch, and representing the views of his and others' constituents on what the restructuring should involve. If necessary, I will convey what he has said to David Mills, the chief executive of Post Office Ltd., whose entire vision for the Post Office is based on maximising opportunities for new products and much better, brighter urban post offices, thanks to the programme of restructuring and investment. We have invested a substantial financial commitment to providing compensation for sub-postmasters who are leaving their businesses, as well as investment for those who are staying, to ensure that the remaining post offices are better and more attractive to customers. That is essential.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Secretary of State makes all the changes sound rather exciting. If she were to lose her seat at the next general election, would she consider opening or taking over a post office and running it? I wonder whether she really understands the pressure that some of our postmasters and postmistresses are under. Would she consider being a postmistress?

Ms Hewitt: I certainly would, given the example of the wonderful Mrs. Patel, who runs an urban post office in a disadvantaged community in my constituency. Like most successful sub-postmasters, she combines it with a retail outlet. She welcomed "Your Guide", but welcomes much more the opportunity to have an automated teller machine in her shop. She has one of several thousand ATMs that have now been installed, thanks to our investment in sub-post offices. That is helping to bring new customers and more business into her post office. Along with many other sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses, she provides a great example of entrepreneurial commitment—which is what Labour wants to encourage, even if the hon. Gentleman does not.

Mr. Willetts: I was going to encourage the Secretary of State to consider a job swap. She is clearly keen to be a postmistress, and we would greatly appreciate a Secretary of State who knew something about the business. Would the Secretary of State consider a swap, even just for a week?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful for the suggestion.

Let me end by saying something about our investment in Royal Mail—a total commitment of some £2 billion over several years. It includes £480 million to rescue the Horizon project and ensure that we have a platform for universal banking, £450 million for the rural network to stop avoidable closures, £210 million to support the urban network reinvention, £15 million to keep open post offices in disadvantaged urban areas that would not otherwise be viable, and £750 million to repay historic debt to Royal Mail so that the renewal and restructuring plan can proceed. It is an extremely successful plan that is significantly reducing Royal Mail Group's losses and returning it to the path to profitability.

That is the commitment—£2 billion over five years—that the Government have made to Royal Mail and, in particular, to the post office network. What do we have from the Conservatives? We have a commitment to grow public spending

"about 1 per cent. more slowly than the Treasury view of the trend rate of nominal GDP growth."

I am, of course, quoting from the medium-term expenditure strategy document recently published by the shadow Chancellor. What the Conservatives offer us is a freezing of the overall total of public spending for the first two years—in other words, a cut of £18 billion in public spending.

I understand that, on top of that, the Conservatives are now considering abolishing the Department of Trade and Industry—abolishing the Department that is making the investments that are beginning to turn Royal Mail around, have saved rural post offices from unnecessary closure, and are supporting an absolutely necessary restructuring of urban post offices.

I hope that when the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) winds up the debate, he will tell us how much of the £2 billion that we have committed to Royal Mail and Post Office Ltd. he intends to cut. If, as appeared to be the case from the speech of the hon. Member for Havant, the Conservatives are saying that they want more money to go into the post office network, perhaps he will tell us how many child care centres he will close to pay for that, how many cuts will be made in the transport budget or how many police officers are to be sacked. Where precisely will the cuts fall? If they are to fall on Royal Mail and the post office network, everything we have heard from the Conservatives this afternoon amounts to crocodile tears, hot air, words with no commitment of resources behind them.

If the Conservatives intend to sustain the investment that we have been making in Royal Mail and post offices, in all honesty, the hon. Gentleman will have to confess to the House that, under his own shadow Chancellor's public spending plans, the cuts will fall somewhere else—on services that, in a different debate, he and his right hon. Friend will be busy defending and crying crocodile tears over.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: No, I will not. I have reached the end of my speech. I just want to make the point that Labour has faced up to tough decisions as his party was never willing to when it was in government. We have backed those tough decisions with the necessary resources, against the Conservatives' commitment to public spending cuts and decline in our public services.

2.29 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I am glad that the Opposition proposed this subject, because it matters to Members from urban constituencies who have seen a programme of closures, and to those who represent rural and market town constituencies and, over many years, have seen one closure after another taking post offices out of villages and small towns up and down the land.

This subject is perhaps the most acute example of how those who govern are completely out of touch with those whom they govern. It is the one matter on which, when hon. Members from all parties give case after case of constituents who have received biased information or who have been pressurised or messed around, Ministers just smile benignly and tell us that there is no bias or pressure, but that there is free choice. We wonder sometimes what planet they are living on. Hon. Members from all parties have made those points, but the Government have decided to close their ears.

What the Liberal Democrat amendment calls for, which in many ways is similar to what the Conservative motion calls for, is respect for people's choices. The statistic that the Secretary of State cited in defence of the Government's position—that six out of 10 new pensioners opt for payment into a bank account—was striking. That is an extraordinarily low figure. One would imagine that of people just arriving at state pension age, eight, nine or nine and a half out of 10 would opt for payment into bank accounts. The fact that four out of 10 new pensioners think that an order book suits them best should tell the Government something: that people like that way of receiving their money.

If that is the case for four out of 10 people who have just retired, it is even more so for people who have been retired for 20 or 30 years, and who have been receiving their pensions in that form very happily. That works for them, so why can their choices not be respected? Every pensioner at any point could have opted for payment into a bank account. The Government have not invented that as a new choice. Pensioners have always had the option of payment into a bank account, so the fact that they have gone on getting money through an order book suggests that that is their positive choice. Why are the Government now telling millions of those people that they do not respect their choice and that they do not think that they have the right to choose the method of payment that suits them best?

Andrew Selous: The hon. Gentleman may be interested in a briefing from the House of Commons Library last year, which said that two thirds of benefits paid in Britain were paid over a post office counter, which meant that 18 million benefit recipients were using post offices to access their benefits. I am sure that he will agree with that.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is right. The use of order books at post offices is very extensive, and reflects people's positive choice. The Government should respect that.

This is a classic case of a lack of joined-up government. One can imagine the day on which the Department for Work and Pensions felt the Chancellor leaning on it to save some money and, after sitting down to think about how to do that, came up with the idea of getting money paid into accounts rather than through giros because it was less expensive. I accept that that is less expensive, but let us guess what happened then. The DWP saved £400 million a year and the Department of Trade and Industry had to find hundreds of millions of pounds to deal with the subsequent mess in the post offices. I sometimes think that if Departments talked to each other, we would be saved many difficulties.

We have many questions to ask about how the system is going to proceed, because millions of pensioners have yet to make a decision and respond to the letters that they have been sent. The Secretary of State has cited customer satisfaction surveys, but I strongly suspect that the pensioners who are most worried about the system do not phone. They receive a letter and are anxious about it because they like the way things work and do not want anything to change, so it is put behind a mantelpiece and not responded to. The people who reply to the customer satisfaction surveys are a biased sample. They are the people who are willing to play the game and respond to the Government, so it is not surprising that they are less likely to be dissatisfied with what they get. We all know, however, of people who are being leaned on. The Government should come clean about that.

We are told that the infamous Post Office card account has been a great triumph and very successful, but I bring to the House's attention a couple of the cases now building up in my constituency in-tray. I am sure that many other hon. Members have similar examples. One constituent, whom I shall call Mrs. P, has had a card account for five weeks but cannot get her money. One does not ask much of an account, but it would not be a bad idea if it paid out money. The postmaster said that the card had not arrived, so she applied for another. He then said that that had not come, but when the lady insisted on checking through, he found both of them. However, the first PIN number was out of date and the second did not work, so she rang the helpline. It told the postmaster to use a blank card from the vault with Mrs. P's PIN number, but that did not work either. She then rang the Pension Service, which said that it would send her something, but that has never arrived.

That is just one example of the way in which people who have played the game and gone along with the Government have found that the system is not working. All those people wish that they had just kept their giros, because they were never told that their giro did not work, or that a PIN number was needed. They just had their giro and got their money.

Mrs. P is not alone. Another lady who has had real problems with the Post Office card account said to me:

"I went to the local Post Office today only to find a notice notifying PO account cardholders that they would be unable to make a withdrawal since the computer had failed."

She wondered how people were going to get their weekly money, and commented:

"If they could not get their money, I fear that some would go without essentials."

If someone has a giro in their hand, they get their money even if a computer is down, but what happens if they have a plastic card and the computer is not working?

I had a helpful reply on that from the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), which said that although the matter was not really anything to do with his Department, it had contacted the Post Office,

"which has confirmed that the branch in question did not follow the correct emergency payment process . . . because the regular subpostmaster was off duty and the branch was being covered by a relief, who did not fully understand the process."

However, the post office staff involved had now been contacted and had the correct process explained to them. So what is supposed to happen if computers go down and people cannot get their money? The Minister's reply continued:

"If the customer needs to access their funds immediately"—

I presume that people quite like to have their pension—

"the Post Office may authorise an instant payment of up to £20."

I know that the pension is not generous under Labour, but allowing people only £20 is pushing it a bit. For how long might the computer be down? Or do those people have to go back the next day for another £20? The letter continued:

"If the customer requires more money, it is possible to get an emergency payment"— not from the Post Office, but

"from the Department. Customers would need to contact the office that normally pays their benefits for this to be arranged."

I can just imagine the process.

None of those complications is necessary. This is not a matter of free choice for people. People ring me up to say that they want to keep their giro, but that they have filled the form in anyway because they are afraid that their giro will just be taken away from them and they will not get their pension. People are responding out of fear, not because they have a free and positive choice. The Secretary of State has given a misleading impression of a free, open choice.

Just to give an example of how the system is not working, the Government have said that people can get all their benefits paid into their Post Office card account, but that is not true. People cannot get their housing benefit paid into their Post Office card account. I have a Department for Work and Pensions document here: the riveting publication "Housing Benefit Direct—March 2004". It says:

"Currently, it is not possible to pay Housing Benefit into a Post Office card account, due to technical and contractual constraints."

So all the pensioners who have had letters asking them to move over to a Post Office card account, and who have played along with the Government, have then found that they cannot get their housing benefit paid into it. Presumably, they receive a giro for that, and go along to the post office with a giro in one hand to get that payment and a plastic card in the other, with their PIN number, to get another one. We can just see the mess, the bureaucracy and the complications.

Mr. Pond: I am a little puzzled. I might have missed something, because I have been in this job only since June, but did pensioners previously get their housing benefit paid into their pension book?

Mr. Webb: No, they did not. What a crushing intervention. However, I presume that the whole point of this new integrated system is to give people a single point of access. It is about bringing benefit recipients into the mainstream; it is financial literacy, a one-stop shop. Instead, we find that people will receive one of the principal benefits, which they use to pay their rent and council tax, in the form of giros, when they have to have a plastic card for other payments. Presumably, the Government want this system to be put in place or they would not be having contractual negotiations. If they think that the scheme is an irrelevant waste of time, why are they having contractual negotiations on it? They cannot have it both ways.

When the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) quoted from an internal memorandum, which he was quite right to do, the Secretary of State responded by saying that the Government were pushing people away from Post Office card accounts to ensure that they were job-ready, which meant that they needed a proper bank account. However, there is no suggestion in the memorandum that that is remotely what has been going on. The memorandum says:

"In order to meet Business Case requirements"— not to help to serve clients—

"we need to move quickly toward getting 9 out of 10 customers who make a new claim onto Direct Payment. Any further delay will"—

Will what? Undermine claimants? No. It will "cause overwhelming backlog in 2004/5, impacting on field performance."

That is nothing to do with serving the public. It is to do with saving money, and the Government should come clean about it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) has already said that the situation in Scotland is very different, and that none of the major banks there will allow customers to access mainstream bank accounts at post offices. The Secretary of State's rather glib reply was that basic bank accounts in Scotland could be accessed through a post office. That is great. People have to open a different bank account—one with rather limited features—if they want to get their money from a post office. That is totally unsatisfactory.

When I asked why it is that people will be unable to pay wages into these accounts, I was told that they are not really regarded as proper accounts. But if the point is to support the post office network, these accounts should surely be made as good as, not as limited as, possible. So I hope that the Minister will recognise in his response that people want these accounts to be proper accounts that are accessible at post offices.

We have heard about the position of people with disabilities, whom the Government seem to have treated as an afterthought. They have rushed out this proposal, and the idea that a PIN pad with nine keys constitutes new technology is astonishing. These issues must have been dealt with before; why were the Government so slow to take them on board?

We have heard a little about the important issue of the exceptions service, and I hope that the Minister is listening at this point. The service will be available from October 2004, we are told, and so far as we can tell it will provide people with a cheque. From April 2005, when the use of order books ceases, anybody who has not replied will presumably be on the exceptions service, so they will be sent a cheque in the post. Into where can they pay that cheque? Presumably, they will be able to pay it into a post office; otherwise, the system would be absurd. So instead of being sent a giro that specifies their name and the amount, which they take to a post office, they will get a cheque that specifies their name and the amount, which they will take to a post office.

What is the point in generating an entirely new system when a perfectly good one already exists that people know and trust? I genuinely cannot fathom this one. Spot the difference between a cheque received in the post that specifies one's name and the amount, and an order book that contains the same information. Why is one system better than the other? I really cannot understand the difference. The millions of people who probably have not responded will want to know what their position will be after April 2005.

The consequence of the Government pushing people into using such accounts and away from post offices is that the latter have suffered. Indeed, 1,000 post offices have closed in the past three years. This is a long-term phenomenon that has existed under Governments of both of the two largest parties. However, even though the rural post office network has supposedly been bolstered, 74 rural post offices have closed in the year to September 2003—a figure that is net of the number that have opened. Indeed, the problem is getting worse. So as has been said, the promise that people's money can be paid into a post office is not worth the paper it is written on if the post offices are not there.

We have heard about the so-called consultation process. It has been acknowledged that it is a shambles, and I shall cite one example from my own constituency. One of the two post offices in the town of Thornbury came up for closure. All the local residents objected and everyone pointed out that the idea would not work, but the Post Office ignored them and shut it. The one remaining post office has people queuing outside the door, and the health and safety people are worried because they cannot fit in the staff needed to deal with all the customers. That does not sound to me like a town that cannot support two post offices, but did the Post Office listen? Of course it did not. I am not convinced that the new, so-called consultation process will be any different from the old one. Frankly, we know what the Government and the Post Office want to achieve, and if an individual post office gets in the way consultation will not make a blind bit of difference. If they are determined to shut it, they will shut it anyway. There has to be an alternative vision, which must be a positive one.

Andrew Selous: Does the hon. Gentleman share Postwatch's concern that some senior Post Office managers are on commission in terms of the number of post offices that are closed in their areas? Is he aware of that development?

Mr. Webb: If that is so it is truly shocking, because it rather suggests that a careful, case-by-case assessment of the merits of individual post offices is not the issue. No one is suggesting that the entire system should be set in stone, but the idea that managers should be rewarded for closing as many post offices as possible as fast as possible is totally unacceptable. It makes a mockery of the suggestion that serious attention is being paid to consulting the public.

There can be, and has to be, a positive future for the post office network, but the key point is that it needs time to adjust. The Government are denying it that time by forcing the pace of transferral to payment into bank accounts. We recognise that people's views change and that, over time, there will be a gradual increase in the number who use bank accounts, with fewer using giros. If that gradual process were allowed to continue, post offices would have time to adjust to taking on the new services about which the Secretary of State has talked. Post offices could give people access to banking services in any case; there is no need to introduce direct payment, or to take away pensioners' right to payment by giro. The two elements are quite separate. We need to boost the post office network, to respect people's choices and to have genuine consultation. So far, the Government have failed to deliver on any of those fronts.

2.45 pm

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): At the end of February, Post Office Ltd. announced the proposed closure of 29 of the 90 sub-post offices in the south Birmingham area. Five of the 14 post offices in Birmingham, Northfield were among those slated for closure—in other words, 35 per cent. of all the local post offices in my constituency.

I do not dispute the fact that we need to recognise that Post Office Ltd. is going through a period of change. Its trade and the pressures to which it is subjected are massively different from those that existed 20 years ago. Not all post offices are sustainable, and as Conservative Members know, 3,500 unplanned closures occurred under the previous Government. So the current Government are right to require Post Office Ltd. to plan for the future. It needs to assess what is sustainable and to maintain those post offices that are sustainable, but it also needs to consider the available opportunities rather than simply focusing on the threats facing individual post offices.

Such an assessment is what the urban reinvention programme was supposed to be about, and we members of the Select Committee were certainly assured that the area plans were supposed not only to look at post offices in isolation, but to consider the needs of entire communities and how the post office service should fit into them. I have difficulty in relating that vision to the slating for closure of 29 of the 90 sub-post offices in south Birmingham.

A number of problems have led to the way in which Post Office Ltd. is currently behaving. It uses a modelling system called Netspec to produce its area plans. Netspec has some strengths, but it is important to put it on the record that Postwatch has said that Netspec has been "a useful tool for assessing where customers will migrate once their 'old' post office has closed", but says that

"it cannot be used as the only tool, as there are occasions when other factors—local geographic or social—may not have received due attention, and customers therefore migrate elsewhere or in different proportions than expected."

I credit Postwatch for the way in which it has represented local views and acted as a watchdog over Post Office Ltd. In doing so, it has cast considerable doubt over the way in which Post Office Ltd. has used its modelling system.

Post Office Ltd. has got the demographic characteristics of my constituency wrong, and has not checked its facts properly. It said that there was virtually no rented housing in one particular area, but it had looked behind the post office in question because of the ward in which was located, rather than across the road to the houses in front of it—presumably because they are in a different local government ward. That side of the road is stacked to the rafters with high-rise blocks of flats, and it is also a large council estate.

Under the terms that Post Office Ltd. has agreed with the Government, it is also required to look properly at deprivation. In planning its changes, it is supposed to consider the 10 per cent. most deprived wards in the country, and the 20 per cent. of wards that contain pockets of severe deprivation. I do not believe that it has looked at the issue of deprivation in my area with sufficient rigour, and I have no reason to think that the situation is different anywhere else. It certainly has not considered the issue of pockets of deprivation. Members on both sides of the House will understand that the word "pocket" is something of a misnomer. The pockets of deprivation in each ward in south Birmingham probably consist of thousands of people, because the wards are very big. There is no sign that Post Office Ltd. is looking at the issue of deprivation sufficiently clearly.

As a result of all this, Post Office Ltd. is not meeting the targets that it is required to meet, at least in the case of south Birmingham. It has promised that more than 95 per cent. of customers should be within a mile of a post office, and that most customers should be within half a mile of one following a closure. The calculation is made not on the basis of where the customers are—I recognise that that can, for all sorts of technical reasons, be quite difficult—but on the basis of the distance between the closing post office and the so-called receiving branch. According to the figures, there is no receiving branch within half a mile of the closing branch in my constituency—not one, but most should be within that distance. About 60 per cent. of the receiving branches are a mile or more away from the closing branches. The required targets have simply not been met.

Mrs. Calton: I should like to draw attention to the report of the performance and innovation unit of 2000. It states:

"The PIU believes it would be better for the Government to dispense with the idea of numerical access criteria . . . Distance based access criteria take no account of the ability to reach a post office . . . The post office should adopt policies which are more closely targeted at achieving its aims in relation to the post office network."

Richard Burden: The hon. Lady has a point. I presume that she, like me, welcomes the fact that the Government commissioned the PIU to examine the future of the Post Office. The report, which I believe the Liberal Democrats supported, made several important points. I believe that distance-based criteria are overly inflexible. My point is that, even according to those criteria, Post Office Ltd. has not met the targets that it is required to meet.

Mrs. Calton: Perhaps I did not make my point clearly enough. Everything that flowed from the PIU report was supposed to be carried out, but it is clear that Post Office Ltd. has not followed the guidance that the report offered.

Richard Burden: It would be fair to say that some of the actions taken by Post Office Ltd. have been consistent with the PIU report, but not others. My point is that, even where the recommendations were followed, there has been severe doubt about the extent to which they have.

Why does Post Office Ltd. get it wrong? There is not too much fundamentally wrong with what the Government have requested, so why does the organisation seem to get things so wrong? One reason is the consultation procedure. I tabled an early-day motion last year on the subject and the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services guaranteed what Post Office Ltd. would be required to do: to consult local communities throughout the process of change, not just at the end of it. That has not happened.

Area plans are constructed on the basis of discussion between Post Office Ltd. and local sub-postmasters. Communities and local authorities are not involved in drawing up the plans: they have their say only at the end of the process, when the plan is published. That is a fundamental flaw, because we could avoid many of the problems if we asked the experts—effectively, the people who live in or represent the area—at an early stage. I certainly welcome the fact that the leader of Birmingham city council, Sir Albert Bore, made that point very clearly to the Post Office in his response to the plan to close 29 sub-post offices in the area.

Another problem is that only the threats not the opportunities for business are considered. It is right for the Government to provide compensation for sub-postmasters where they are losing their business and the post office is simply not viable. However, as I said earlier, the Post Office's approach to the problem is so inflexible that it effectively forces a local sub-postmaster to quit the business and get out, because it makes more financial sense for the sub-postmaster to do that than to sell the business to another business person who might have a sustainable plan to keep it going. I believe that that is not only wrong but uneconomic.

That position arose in my constituency, and I shall use mythical figures to illustrate the point. If a business is worth about £50,000 on the market, it is possible for the sub-postmaster to be offered £70,000 in compensation to get rid of the business, yet another business person could be willing to take it over on the basis of a viable business plan. In those circumstances, the sub-postmaster would have to be mad to sell to the new business person for £50,000 when he could receive £70,000 for shutting the branch down. The Government should know that that is how the Post Office is operating the plan, which I do not believe conforms to the spirit of what was agreed. I ask the Government to encourage Post Office Ltd. to be more flexible and to examine how it might be possible to save public money and sustain viable businesses on that basis.

Andrew Selous: To illustrate the hon. Gentleman's very good point further, does he share my upset on learning from Postwatch that the Post Office has been instructed to reject other sources of funds that might have been available to keep a post office going? The concern was that there was a danger of establishing a precedent that might keep post offices in business. Does that not reinforce his point?

Richard Burden: The problem is the approach of Post Office Ltd., which is not in keeping with the spirit of what was agreed with the Government. A closure of a sub-post office is properly a matter for Government intervention, the use of Government funds and so forth. The improvement of the funds of certain receiving branches may also be relevant. Post Office Ltd regards someone knowing that a sub-postmaster wants to leave a business but believing that he, instead, can make a go of it as a matter only of a transaction between the sub-postmaster who is getting out and the new business person who wants to come in. It acts in a wholly hands-off way in that respect, which can lead to the crazy position described by the hon. Gentleman, whereby potential sources of funds are effectively ignored by Post Office Ltd.

Mr. Weir: Is the situation not rather worse? Under the Post Office procedure, no one knows before the closure announcement is made that the business may be up for sale. That might be for good, confidential reasons, but by the time it becomes public knowledge that a post office may be going, it is too late for anyone to make an offer to take over the business.

Richard Burden: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point, which underlines the fact that the consultation should be structured differently. If Post Office Ltd. recognises the need for change in a particular area because not all the post offices are sustainable, it should be prepared to sit down and work out who wants to stay and who wants to go, and to decide the right pattern of post office provision. Perhaps in one area all the sub-post offices should be closed and another one opened. It is theoretically possible that they are all in the wrong place to serve local people. If there were a willingness properly to plan the needs of an area, those problems could be tackled, but the way in which Post Office Ltd. goes about it means that that does not happen.

Furthermore the Post Office approach undermines the laudable objectives that the Secretary of State mentioned earlier. She and the Government should be applauded for their searching and ambition to open up new business for the Post Office. They should also be applauded for their investment in making the Horizon project work more effectively. They are right to say that the Post Office should be trying to find new business, provide outlets on the high street for clearing banks, look towards the possibilities for insurance and so forth. All that is right but difficult to reconcile with the strictures that Post Office Ltd. has put on itself in carrying out the urban reinvention programme.

I therefore ask my right hon. Friends to talk to Mr. Mills and his colleagues again to remind them that they are supposed to be reinventing the network on the basis of a vision, not simply implementing closures. I know that Ministers do not want the latter. They want a reinvented and sustainable network, but I have to say that Post Office Ltd. is not living up to that vision at present. That explains why there is a major campaign in my area of Birmingham against what Post Office Ltd. is proposing. I am pleased to say that the local paper, the Birmingham Evening Mail, is spearheading the campaign very effectively.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): It is why my hon. Friend is making his speech.

Richard Burden: Indeed; it is why I am speaking in the debate. Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the area have tabled an early-day motion to ask Post Office Ltd. to think again. The only Birmingham Labour Member who has not signed the motion is the Minister for the Arts, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Estelle Morris), who has told me that she supports it and is on record as a supporter of it, but as a Minister is unable to sign it. There is unanimity among Birmingham Labour MPs that Post Office Ltd. should think again.

Concern about the proposals crosses the political divide in Birmingham, so it is with some regret that I must report that the leader of the Liberal Democrats on the city council has taken the opportunity to spread what I have to call untruths about what I and other Labour Members have been doing. He has alleged that we voted for the closures in south Birmingham, on 13 January this year and on 20 October 2002. However, the calendar shows that the latter date was a Sunday. As far as I know, Parliament does not sit on a Sunday: if that vote took place, I missed it.

There may be differences of view about the urban reinvention programme, the handling of the Post Office card account and the compensation issue, and it is right to debate them, both in the House and elsewhere. However, people are worried about the loss of local post offices and have real fears about what the future holds. They expect local politicians to join together to represent their interests. It is not acceptable, therefore, to spread untrue allegations about members of other parties, when in fact we are all on the same side.

If the leader of the Liberal Democrats on Birmingham city council acts as he has previously, I expect that a leaflet will be distributed in the next few days saying that, when I vote against the Conservative motion and in favour of the Government amendment tonight, that means that I have once again voted for post office closures. As the House knows, post office closures are not voted on in the House, so no hon. Member of any party can vote either for or against such closures.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: I can understand why the hon. Gentleman is frustrated and cross with the Liberal Democrat leader on his local council, but the Opposition motions of 13 January and today have attracted Liberal Democrat support. Moreover, and more importantly, today's debate gives the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to vote in line with his campaign. He may not want to join Opposition Members in the Lobby—although he would be more than welcome to do so, as a way to back up the rhetoric that he has used in his speech—but it is difficult to take his rhetoric at face value when he supports a Government amendment that is both self-congratulatory and uncritical. At the very least, he should consider abstaining.

Richard Burden: The Opposition have blown it when it comes to the motion. It makes some reasonable points about how Post Office Ltd. has gone about the restructuring programme, but the punchline can be found in the motion's final couple of lines. They state that the House

"condemns the Government's failure to deliver benefits and tax credits in a simple, easy to understand manner while at the same time jeopardising the future prosperity of the Post Office."

I understand that the Opposition believe that, but they are wrong. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier, either we face the future by trying to plan for it and by requiring Post Office Ltd. to consult properly, or we opt for the free-for-all evident under the previous Conservative Government, when 3,500 sub-post offices closed.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Earlier, my hon. Friend mentioned the Horizon project. Does he recall that it was introduced by the previous Conservative Government, and that its aim of paying pensions and benefits by smartcard caused all sorts of problems? The difficulties faced by post offices stem from the actions of that Government, and Opposition Members will not get away with rewriting history. Does my hon. Friend also accept that the Horizon project cost £500 million, and that £50 million was needed to put it right?

Richard Burden: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. That is a salutary lesson for Opposition Members. If they want to throw stones, they should realise that they do so from a rather fragile glasshouse.

It is important to put on the record the actions of the Liberal Democrat leader on Birmingham city council. Some modes of behaviour are acceptable in politics, and some are not. I believe that he has transgressed the line. Local people do not want politicians to behave like that. It is important for south Birmingham that politicians of all parties band together on this matter. We do not want to mislead people by claiming that every post office in every corner of Birmingham can be saved, but we can say that Post Office Ltd., in drawing up the plan, has fallen short of what the Government's requirements set out. It has identified the threats to local post offices, but not the opportunities open to them. It has also got its facts wrong, in a variety of ways.

As I said, I am a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which has announced that it is to undertake another investigation of post offices and the urban reinvention programme. Given that, it would be madness for Post Office Ltd. to go ahead with the planned closure programme for south Birmingham. The plan should be withdrawn, and Post Office Ltd. should think again. It needs to sit down with people from the local communities, elected politicians and others to determine what sort of post offices people in south Birmingham need, and to decide how to plan for the future. Post offices that are not sustainable should be closed, but high-quality services to local people must be maintained. Post offices should be encouraged to take on new business, so that they can provide a much better service for local people in the future.

3.7 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I have been a Member of Parliament for 12 years, and have taken part in many debates on the importance of post offices. This is a vital subject. The Post Office is a recognised brand, for which people have great affection. I grew up in Swansea, very near to a post office. I used to go in with my mother, and it was probably one of the first shops I ever entered. Even then, I knew the importance of the post office network.

When Ministers talk about restructuring, they are using an Orwellian code that means closure—a word they dare not use. In that context, using the word "restructuring" is like using the term "rightsizing" to explain why an employee has been sacked. What is happening is that the post office network as we understand it is being culled.

I am the first to accept that post offices have been closed by previous Governments, of all political complexions. However, I remember sitting on the Government Benches—and I will sit there again very shortly and without crossing the Floor—and the then Labour Opposition of 1992–97 telling us that post offices were closing. They said that that was callous, and that the Government of the day needed to do something about it. There was a suggestion at that time that the Government were going to change the benefit system, and that benefits would be paid by means of a card.

The Conservative Government considered the matter and listened to what the public had to say. Our proposals for the card system were never implemented, but this Government are going ahead with introducing their own version. Labour Opposition Members at the time said that the urban and rural post office networks were both vitally important, for different reasons.

In my Ribble Valley constituency, the towns of Clitheroe and Longridge have vibrant post offices. A number of villages still have post offices but, sadly, some have closed since 1997.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I am interested to hear what my hon. Friend says about the rural scene in his constituency. Does he recognise that in a suburban area such as Orpington, which I represent, the little parades of shops are dependent on the local post offices as a central component? If the post office goes, the parades often fold.

Mr. Evans: With my retail hat on, I accept that point completely. To the grocer, butcher, fishmonger, pharmacist and other small retailers, the post office is part of the community of services available to the public. When a vital part of that community is taken away, the others start to struggle. When the boards go up outside the post office, it is often not long before the boards go up outside other retail outlets.

We have always been told that the post office network is important. I was depressed when I saw in the Lancashire Evening Post the other day the headline "Nine post offices to shut". That included five in Preston, two in Chorley and two in Penwortham. Postwatch wrote to me on 18 March about those closures, and about the proposed closure of five post offices in Rotherham and 13 in Bury. Today we have heard about 29 closures in south Birmingham—from a Labour Member. Irrespective of party, if we wish to see a post office network of any worth survive into the future, we should speak up about it now and do something before it disappears completely—otherwise, a vital asset will be lost to this country for ever.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the growth in the elderly population and how important the post office network is to that sector of the community. Some of them do not have access to cars or other transport, especially in rural areas where the bus service is not what it used to be. That is why they need local post offices, which often sell other items. They also enjoy the opportunity to chat to post office staff and meet other members of the community.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Has my hon. Friend come across the problem that my elderly and rural constituents face because Powergen, with only three weeks' notice, has withdrawn the electricity token service from post offices? People without transport, and of necessity on low incomes—and many of them not very mobile—had been able to purchase tokens at the post office to feed their meters at home. However, after scant consultation, Powergen has decided to withdraw that service. Does my hon. Friend agree that that action weighs most heavily on the elderly and less well-off in rural areas?

Mr. Evans: Of course it does, because the token system is designed to ensure that the less well-off are able to eke out their resources and maintain their supplies of power. I hope that Powergen will think again. I hope that it will consult properly with the post office network and their customers to see whether the service should continue. I hope that Powergen will also listen closely to what my right hon. Friend has said today. I suspect that we are talking about another nail in the coffin. The withdrawal of that service might not, by itself, be the reason for closure, but alongside all the other changes that the Government have made it will make post offices less viable.

I asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether she would consider becoming a postmistress and she said gleefully that she would if she lost her seat. I think that was a hollow reply, because the profitability of post offices is part of the problem. I agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden) about the incentives offered to postmasters and postmistresses to give up their post offices. If people are not making any money from their post office and somebody offers them a pot of cash, they will probably take it, because they are frightened of the future. They have seen the profitability of their post offices decline because of the withdrawal of services such as Powergen's, and the lack of footfall because so many benefits are now paid into bank and building society accounts. They take the cash and get out of the business, thus reducing the number of post offices further.

I encourage the Government to consider what new services post offices might be able to provide, but some post offices in smaller areas are unable to expand. Will postmasters and postmistresses who see their profitability falling risk borrowing more money—if they even can—to expand the goods and services available in their post offices? If a post office is run by a husband and wife team, they are chained to it from the time it opens in the morning until it closes in the early evening. Because of the lack of profitability, they cannot afford to employ anyone to give them some time off. We have to consider the profitability of post offices, but as we have heard today fewer people are going into post offices and fewer transactions are taking place.

The Secretary of State mentioned 25 million banking transactions, but how much profit do post offices receive, compared with the old system? The reality is that they are making less profit. There are fewer post offices, and they are not as viable as they used to be. Running a post office is also a huge responsibility, because it is a cash-based business. We heard about the introduction of ATMs to post offices, but many people resent the charges they impose for withdrawals. In the past, withdrawing money was free of charge, but now it costs £1.25 or £1.75. I can understand why people on fixed incomes feel so strongly about having to pay those charges.

I pay tribute to one of my local post offices in Bolton by Bowland. It has added tea rooms to diversify its services, although that is a lot more effort for those in charge. During the rugby world cup, the post office opened at unsocial hours so that people could come together and enjoy England's great victory.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): How did Wales do?

Mr. Evans: Well, we helped England to that great victory in some of the games we played in the world cup.

As I was saying, opportunities for diversification are limited. I hope that the Minister, when he winds up, does not treat this as just another debate on post offices that has to be got through before the next debate on the same issue in a few months' time. In the meantime, we will see yet more closures and more services withdrawn. I welcome the fact that banks are using the post offices as a resource. Banks used to have branches in villages, but they have now withdrawn from villages and smaller towns. I hope that all the banks will join in, including the Scottish banks, so that all customers benefit.

This whole subject boils down to the question of choice. Some elderly people have received phone calls about how they would like their benefits to be paid, and they have been discouraged from opening a post office account. They are told that it is better for their money to be paid directly into their bank or building society, but that is no choice.

Mr. Webb: I note that the Minister is shaking his head. Is he suggesting that the hon. Gentleman is lying? I do not understand why, given that all hon. Members have had constituents come to us about post office closures. What does it take to get the Government to realise that this is actually happening?

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. As he asked in his speech, what planet are the Government living on? Frankly, they are in a parallel universe. I have taken part in public meetings with pensioners in my constituency, and they told me that, when they sent back the forms that they had filled in, someone phoned them to encourage them to go to a bank or building society. Pensioners have stood up in a public meeting to tell me that that has happened.

Towards the end of our period in government, we became arrogant—we stopped listening—but that took us 18 years. It has only taken a few years for that lot to succumb to the arrogance of power. They must listen to the facts. I am certainly not lying to the House when I say this, and I cannot believe that pensioners are lying to me when they say that they have received phone calls encouraging them not to take up Post Office accounts, but to go to banks and building societies.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman not think that it is very important that pensioners are given personal advice when they make an important decision such as how to draw their benefits or how to bank their money, and that it is difficult to apply one-size-fits-all rules to everyone? Surely he should welcome the fact that people are being telephoned and offered a personal and helpful advice service.

Mr. Evans: I suspect that, if people choose banks and buildings societies, they do not get a phone call saying, "Have you perhaps considered opening a Post Office account?" No one has told me that that is part of the problem. Yes, I welcome the fact that they are given advice, given that they are taking an important decision, but they ought to be told as well that, if too many of them pull out of post offices completely they will become less viable than they are currently and that the current post office network will completely disappear. Yes, by all means let us give people information, but let them make the decision. Let us not take the decision away from them or try to goad them into a direction that may be against their own long-term interests. I hope that the Minister will accept that those things are going on, although they are anecdotal stories, and certainly that no one in the House today is lying when we say that those things are happening.

Mr. Pond: I am not accusing any hon. Member of lying, either verbally or by my body language. I ask hon. Members to understand that we have a responsibility to help people to understand the full range of their choices. I ask them to consider what happens when a pensioner makes or receives a call and is told—perhaps after listening to this debate—by the sub-postmaster or mistress, "Look, they won't let you have a Post Office card account." The pensioner then makes a call to say, "I want a Post Office card account," and the person on the other end of the line rightly says, "Let me tell you about the different range of options first." That may be perceived as encouraging the pensioner away from the Post Office card account, but the person on the end of the line is simply making sure that the pensioner knows the full range of options.

Mr. Evans: As I say, I very much hope that, when people are considering their options for banks and building societies, they receive similar phone calls to ensure that they know all the options. I look forward to the call-centre scripts being made available in the Library, so that we can see whether that goes on. However, perhaps it would be beneficial if the Minister were to issue guidelines to ensure the integrity of the system, so that elderly people or those in receipt of benefits are not led one way or the other before making an informed decision. I hope that he will consider the system again to ensure that there is no goading one way or the other.

I have been an MP for 12 years and have been attending debates such as this throughout that time. The acceleration in the number of urban post offices that closed last year is a great worry, as is the number of rural post offices that are still closing, including in my constituency. We have seen rural banks close. We have seen the pubs in rural areas go into decline, and some of them have disappeared. Pharmacies have been mentioned. Small retail stores in villages are no longer profitable. Post offices are the last shops left in some villages and, when they go, a whole way of life—the rural community spirit—will completely disappear from those areas.

We need to ensure that the consultation on such issues is fair. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield said, there must be options for other people to take over post offices. The Post Office must be far more vigorous in looking for fresh people to take them over. Perhaps people should be given an incentive to bring in new ideas about how those post offices can work. The consultation must not be rigged or prejudged. It must not be carried out with the intention that those involved were thinking of closing seven post offices, so they will do so irrespective of what the people say.

Frankly, the supposed managed closure programme represents set-aside for our post offices. They are being put to one side. They are being put into the long grass. The post office network that we all love has become something of a Titanic: it is sinking fast, and instead of the Government shoring up the ship to try to ensure that it will not disappear, they have made the hole bigger. I call on the Minister today to give a guarantee that he will do what he can to find ways to preserve the current network. No managed disappearance of post offices, please. Let us ensure that post offices—whether urban or rural—are valued for what they are. Let us look for ways to ensure that they have a future well into this century.

3.26 pm

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): The motion refers to "the significant role played by local post offices in both rural and urban areas".

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has told us about the situation in rural areas, and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden) made a thoughtful speech about the situation in south Birmingham. Like my hon. Friend, I wish to concentrate on rural areas, and in doing so, talk about the problem facing people in Norfolk because of Powergen's actions, which my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) mentioned briefly in an intervention.

People sometimes underestimate just how different things are in rural areas compared with urban areas. My constituency covers 350 square miles: Greater London, which contains 74 parliamentary constituencies, covers 650 square miles. My constituency is more than half the size of Greater London. My right hon. Friend, whose constituency neighbours mine, has a constituency some three times the size of mine—at about 1,300 square miles, I think. Post offices in rural areas are part of the social fabric of local communities, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield acknowledged when he was dealing with urban areas.

Mrs. Shephard: I thank my hon. Friend for referring to the entirely different problems faced by people in far-flung rural areas. I have a letter from the postmaster at Banham in my constituency, who says that as a result of Powergen's decisions, residents will now have to travel nine miles to the nearest pay-point outlet and nine miles back. For many elderly, disabled or less well-off people, that is not an option.

Mr. Bacon: I agree with my right hon. Friend. Such a journey is not an option for many people. That is why I have taken up the issue with Powergen and with the Post Office, to ask whether they can renegotiate. Indeed, I have also taken it up with Ofgem, to see whether it thinks that Powergen is acting against the public interest. I, too, represent constituents who will have to travel some distance to get electricity swipe cards topped up—to a neighbouring market town, in this case—as a result of Powergen's decision to withdraw the contract from the Post Office.

People in Roydon in my constituency, some of whom are on limited incomes and do not have cars, can knock on the doors and Mr. and Mrs. West will open up after hours, even at 9.30 at night, so that a young mother with two children who has suddenly run out of electricity can be reconnected. Effectively, that is a social service, and there seems to be no reason why Powergen should unilaterally remove the contract from the Post Office.

I received from Powergen a letter of the sort that we all receive from time to time, explaining how it was enhancing its service. There is a German word, "Verschlimmbesserung", which, loosely translated, means the process by which, as things are improved, they get worse. We are familiar with that process from many different aspects of life, and it is certainly applicable in this case. I look forward to receiving a sensible reply from Powergen and hearing about a reconsideration of this ill-considered and ill-thought-out policy.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Is my hon. Friend aware of another relevant German expression that is difficult to translate into any other language? What is happening displays that Powergen has anything other than "Fingersptizengefühl"—a fingertip feel.

Mr. Bacon: I am aware of that expression; my hon. Friend makes a good point, and Powergen needs to reconsider the issue with some care.

The second issue that I want to raise involves a specific problem that arose some three years ago because of the decision of Mrs. Rogers, the then sub-postmistress at Coldham Green, Deopham, to retire from running the post office in Pie lane. As she was retiring, she requested that the post box in her front garden be taken away. Indeed, the parish council suggested that the box should be resited somewhere else, which seemed perfectly reasonable. It also seemed reasonable that Mrs. Rogers should no longer have a post box in her front garden when she was no longer running the post office.

The problem that subsequently arose has endured for so long because of Royal Mail's failure locally—I stress the word "locally"—to understand, recognise or acknowledge the difference between resiting and removing. Thus, the local Royal Mail manager's response to concerned local residents, to the parish council and to me has been to ask why residents of Coldham Green should have an additional post box. In fact, all that local residents are asking for is the relocation of a previously existing box in a slightly different place. The local Royal Mail manager has gone so far as to allege that there is a post box in a place where there is none.

I have gone to the chief executive and chairman of Royal Mail, who have been helpful, and I look forward to receiving a sensible response. I have walked the route that people must now take, and I can see how dangerous it is. Without a post box in their area, local people must walk to the other end of the village down a road that has a 60 mph speed limit—although it certainly should have a lower limit. Young mothers with prams must push their small children down the lane to the post box at the other end of the village, but there is no verge and there is nowhere for them to hide. That is not a practical option, and many people refuse to take it and are thus deprived of a service. I hope to get a sensible answer out of Royal Mail in due course, and also some indication that it will encourage its local managers to take a slightly more helpful and interested approach. Postwatch is also escalating the priority attached to the local complaint, and I hope that there will be a resolution.

As for the so-called neutral position on the Post Office card account, a number of hon. Members have referred to the apparent difference between what we, and our constituents, are experiencing in our daily lives and what is happening over there on Planet Hewitt, where there seems to be no difference between the treatment of the options on offer, and they are apparently being laid out in a neutral way. How can Age Concern, Citizens Advice, the National Consumer Council, the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, the Communication Workers Union and the National Federation of Women's Institutes all have expressed concern about the obstacles and difficulties in opening a Post Office card account, yet the Government and Ministers on Planet Hewitt do not seem to think that there is a problem? The Minister should be careful before he takes on the National Federation of Women's Institutes. He should recall what happened to his boss when he tried to do that.

It is absolutely clear that there is an issue. Indeed, the guidance given to Department for Work and Pensions staff, contains this statement:

"We need to pay most of these customers into bank accounts which cost 1p, rather than into Post Office card accounts, which cost up to 30 times more. You should be aiming to get nine out of 10 new claimants into bank accounts, with a small proportion paid through Post Office card accounts."

That does not sound very neutral to me.

That prompts another question. Quite apart from the fact that there is not the neutrality that the Government allege, why should the card accounts cost so much more than bank accounts? After all, lottery terminals have been put into convenience stores, post offices and small shops throughout the country. The proposed payment system is relatively simple, and ought not to cost 30 times more than bank accounts. If one looked into the problem, I suspect that one would discover that, as is often the case with Government IT projects, the Government's IT advice has cost more than it should.

As hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who introduced the debate, have said, the key issue is choice. Theoretically, at least, the Government are in favour in choice. Indeed, the Prime Minister's Office of Public Services Reform, in the pamphlet, "Principles into Practice", published in March 2002, said:

"Choice acknowledges that consumers of public services should increasingly be given the kind of options that they take for granted in other walks of life."

Amen to that. The Government should back up their rhetoric and give our constituents in both urban and rural areas the kind of choice that they expect.

3.36 pm

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): This is an important debate, in which we can air our views about the future of postal services—a subject that matters to older people, younger people and others who use post offices. In Chorley we face two closures—the Moor Road post office in Pall Mall and the post office on Eaves lane. I am worried about the criteria used for closure, and I would like genuine consultation. Anyone who has been through a closure programme knows that consultation is usually a charade. As we head into a consultation on those two crucial post offices in Chorley, I hope that there will be genuine dialogue, and that geographical considerations will be taken into account. There is no post office in Chorley to the south of either of those post offices, and we cannot expect people who have to walk half a mile to use them to walk another half mile to use the next one. Older people cannot walk that far, and a journey of that distance is certainly not feasible for young mothers who may want to call at a post office on the way to school.

I regret that the Post Office is considering closing those post offices, and there must be full genuine consultation. It should listen to local elected representatives and the people who use those post offices. If the Post Office listens to us and takes our views on board, I do not expect it to close them. If the sub-postmaster wishes to get out of the business, the Post Office should approach shopkeepers in the area and nearby supermarkets and say that, rather than allowing a local facility to be lost, it would like them to consider taking on the franchise. The Post Office should go o and look at other shops to try to see if they can facilitate a replacement. We do not want a Post Office that is determined to close sub-post offices but one that is determined to keep them open. That is a crucial point, and I hope that it will be taken on board.

We have heard a lot of rhetoric today from the Opposition, and they have shed many crocodile tears. Under the previous Government, 3,500 post offices closed, but not once do Conservative Members refer to that. If they are genuine—and I expect people to be genuine in the Chamber—they should not try to make political gains but should make genuine arguments on behalf of their constituents. That is how debates should be conducted—[Interruption.] Hon. Members might ask, "Which way are you going to vote?" but that is not the way to proceed. We ought to tell the Minister that there are problems, and that we expect a listening Government to take our views on board. They should propose a solution, refine it and use their vote as shareholder in the Post Office to tell it that they do not like the way in which it is doing business, and they expect it to change. The Post Office should listen to hon. Members, and take our views on board.

Andrew Selous: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that every Opposition Member who has spoken, as well as his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden), has asked the Post Office to be more flexible and more creative and to look at the issue from the point of view of the whole community? That is the central point that has been made this afternoon.

Mr. Hoyle: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is trying to say. He is slightly embarrassed because he knows the debate is a political one. I would have liked to believe that we could genuirely express our views and concerns, but apparently, the real purpose of the debate is to make political points. That is wrong. It should be an opportunity for Members to make our voices heard.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I do not know whether my hon. Friend's experience is the same as mine, but I discovered that when post offices were facing closure, surveys carried out among the local population made it clear that many people did not realise the full extent of the services that post offices offer. The Post Office could do a great deal more to advertise the services that are available and would be of benefit to people.

Mr. Hoyle: My hon. Friend is spot on. We ought to be telling people not only how good post offices are and how vital they are to a community, but about the services available to them. People have forgotten how many services post offices offer. I believe that the Post Office should offer even more services, and that they should be franchised.

Mr. Evans: I hope that neither of the post offices in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is being incentivised to close. I agree that the consultation must be carried out properly, not rigged. The Lancashire Evening Post reports that there will be a six-week consultation, and that

"Royal Mail bosses say the proposals are a direct reaction to declining custom and changes in the benefits system where cash is paid into the bank."

Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that that is a problem, and that we must ensure that customers have the choice of collecting their benefits from the post office?

Mr. Hoyle: Of course the hon. Gentleman is correct. I intended to come on to that point and say that my hon. Friend the Minister may not be aware of the difficulties faced by people who wish to keep to the old system. It is true that the legislation provides the right of choice for them. But somewhere in the bowels of the administration it is made difficult for people not to go into the banking system. That is what worries me.

I do not believe there are many MPs who have not been approached by constituents—older pensioners—who say, "I don't want the new system. I want to stay with the old system." They fill in form after form, and as Members of Parliament, we get involved. It seems that somebody somewhere is blocking the system and not clearing the forms as quickly and effectively as they should. They are looking for a minor point on which to reject our constituents' requests. The Minister may not be aware of that. We need a thorough investigation to ensure that the process runs smoothly once people fill in the form, and that they do not have to go without the money they are entitled to for any length of time.

A further issue on which I appeal to the Minister concerns people who may not be able to get to the post office because of illness. Someone has to collect the money for them, and that is a worry if they are ill for four or five weeks. We need to recognise that as a genuine concern and see how we can improve the situation. We all deal with big problems relating to post offices, but we all recognise that sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses offer a superb service. The post office is the focal point of a community, urban or rural. It provides a service that we love and have enjoyed over many years. We want future generations to be able to enjoy the post office, as we have. I hope that the service can become more flexible and more creative, recognising that post offices should remain open and offer their services to the community.

We do not want people to look at a map and say, "Let's take these post offices out, because we think there are too many." That is wrong. They should examine the demographics of the area and the age profile of the people who live there. They should listen to the Member of Parliament and other local representatives in each constituency where closures are proposed. Please let us take that on board, and tell the Post Office that its ambitious plan to close so many post offices is unacceptable. Let us listen to the community and put the community interest first.

3.45 pm

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): We have heard so much this afternoon, and I have spoken before on the matter in the Chamber, about the huge flaws in the network reinvention programme as it applies not just to my constituency but to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) and the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey). Flawed information was given to us on 17 December— which some of us did not receive until 18 December—the process itself was flawed, decision making was flawed and secretive, and the sum total of all the work that was put in was that four post offices were closed. Today and this week, post offices are closing and elderly and disabled people are being left without access.

Of the respondents to our consultation, which we thought supported that of Post Office Ltd., 80 per cent. were over 55, and 40 per cent. had mobility problems. I was astonished at that figure. I expected it to be 10 or 15 per cent. I had no idea that it would be so high.

To add insult to injury, as I said in an intervention earlier, we ended up being told during the decision-making process that, because it was recognised that the process was flawed, it would be altered for the future. But despite letters to Postwatch, Post Office Ltd. and the Minister, I have been able to obtain nothing other than sympathy, which is lovely but does nothing about the real problem. The process for my constituency and others involved in the same period should have been halted. I requested that of the Minister and Post Office Ltd., and I made my final appeals last week before the closures took place, but I have had no substantive response from either on those last-minute appeals. Postcomm and Postwatch told me that neither of them had any powers to halt the process even though it is recognised that it was flawed from beginning to end.

The performance and innovation unit report, by which we are guided in the whole procedure, at chapter 8, page 2 on delivering objective 1, states that there should be convenient access for all to post offices—not just some of the population, but all. It states:

"The Post Office network should offer people in all parts of the country convenient access to the services available in post offices."

I highlight one of the post offices in my constituency that closed on Monday this week. The main receiving office is not on a bus route, the car park close to it is always full during daytime hours, and it is at the top of a steep hill. I do not understand how all the community can possibly have access to that receiving office.

It has become clear that the process is being driven not by the strategic overview that we had all expected, but by a wish to close as many sub-post offices as possible as quickly as possible. It has been a case of the devil take the hindmost. The deal offered to sub-postmasters and mistresses has been one that many have simply been unable to refuse. The Government made available £180 million for compensation. I do not argue with that. On average, £55,000 was paid out in the last quarter to December 2003 to individual sub-postmasters and mistresses. That is £38 million in one quarter of last year, and the figure is likely to be higher for the current quarter. What checks have been made on those payouts? Why is the payout based on takings six months before closure, when the closure information presented to Postwatch and others is based on takings including the past six months? Is that not an incentive to run down the business in the final six months?

How many of those sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses have owned their businesses for less than two to three years, having taken them on knowing that this process was in place? I am not suggesting that that is a factor in all cases, but I would like to think that the Government seek to ensure that taxpayers' money is spent on the purposes for which it was intended, and not simply used for handouts to close post offices that should be kept open because the sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress wants to go.

My experience of Postwatch has not been as good as that of Labour Members, and I suspect that there are variations between different parts of the country. We have held four public meetings in my constituency, which were attended by Postwatch representatives. My constituents want to know Postwatch's purpose. Why does the Postwatch representative in the north-west, who attended the public meetings, report to Postwatch in London rather than to Postwatch in the north-west? Who authorises him to make derogatory remarks about public campaigns, or did he think of that for himself? Whose side is he on?

Mrs. Anne Campbell: My experience of Postwatch has been extremely positive. Postwatch has done everything possible to help me to fight inappropriate post office closures in my area. In order to try to save a post office in my constituency, one case has been escalated up the ladder to the top of Postwatch. I cannot praise Postwatch highly enough, and I hope that the hon. Lady's experience is not replicated elsewhere.

Mrs. Calton: I am happy to acknowledge that my experience occurred in my area. It was not only my experience, but that of members of the public, who asked, "Why did Postwatch bother to come?" I understand that time is short and that the summing-up speeches must begin shortly.

I shall reiterate the health benefits of a vibrant post office network. It may seem a jump from this debate to health impacts, but the health of communities is a determinant of the health of individuals within those communities. Removing an important asset such as a post office has a huge impact on the health of a community. The other day, I heard that the best treatment for leg ulcers is to put three or four people with leg ulcers together to allow them to talk to each other, which makes them get better, along with the necessary medical work.

Elderly people should not be left alone in our communities, but they are. A huge percentage of the public spend most of each week alone, and visits to the post office and local shops make a big difference to their lives. The long-term cost to the community of post office closures will be huge. The PIU report states that "supporting vulnerable people" and are important parts of what a post office has to offer.

"acting as a focal point for the community"

I agree that there is an opportunity to reverse years of decline. In particular, it should be possible to offer post offices that open longer and that serve a broader customer base, but that is not the experience in my area, where there has been no attempt to combine retail with a post office to create a thriving local business. It could have been done, but it was not even tried. The question I have to ask is: where is the strategic vision? Those customers will not simply move from one place to another, mainly because they are not capable of doing so. If we turn post offices into banks, they compete with the banks—what about their customer base then? Network reinvention is destroying the customer base, tearing the heart out of communities, increasing car use and adding to social exclusion.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I realise that time is short, so I want purely to repeat that it is extremely regrettable that Powergen has decided to discontinue selling electricity tokens. I quote from an e-mail that I received yesterday from an ever-alert South Bedfordshire councillor, who said:

"There appears to have been no consultation about this . . . They have given only one week's notice and having spoken to PayPoint it will take about 1 month to set up a new Paypoint station. Apart from this being another nail in the coffin of Village Post Offices if you examine the list of outlets within the Hockliffe vicinity there are 6 in Dunstable and 8 in Leighton Buzzard. None of these are on a direct bus route. Once again this will affect the elderly in particular."

At a time when we should be encouraging the Post Office to take on an extra range of services to increase footfall, I hope that the Minister will take that matter seriously and speak to Powergen so that something can be done about it.

3.56 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): During this debate, hon. Members on both sides of the House sought to express their views and concerns about post office services—as opposed to the post office network, which was the subject of the debate that took place, again in Opposition time, on 13 January. In doing so, we are motivated by our deep commitment to what characterises the communities that we are sent here to represent, be they rural, suburban or urban. As we know from our own experiences, from the representations that we receive day in, day out, and—ironically—from the volume of correspondence in our postbags, people in those communities feel that local post offices define not only their sense of belonging, but their ability to express that through their relationships with staff, particularly in terms of being known and identified. That gives great comfort to elderly and vulnerable people in particular.

That is the context in which we are considering post office services and the developments that have taken place as a result of the actions and omissions of this Government. The key element in the debate was identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) when he so ably, expertly and cogently opened the debate—[Interruption.] I am sure that his objective assessment will be confirmed by Ministers, who are properly subject to it.

At the heart of the matter lies the element of customer choice, and the whole business of providing post office services must be motivated by what is right for them in making those choices. That is reflected by campaigns that have been going on up and down the land. In Broxtowe in Nottinghamshire, Councillors Sheila Foster, Joan Briggs and Tom Pettengell have raised petitions of more than 1,200 names to campaign against the closures of Chilwell and Attenborough post offices. Yet when we debated that matter on 13 January, the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) chose not to join us in the Lobby, although the motion gave him a perfect opportunity to confirm by voting some of the rhetoric that he and others had expressed during that campaign.

The same could be said of the campaign to try to stop the closure of the Finchley Church End post office in the constituency of Finchley and Golders Green, and of the contributions of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden). However much Labour Members may not want to incur the wrath of their Whips, there comes a time when their votes must equal their rhetoric and campaigning in their constituencies. It is clear that the Conservative party spokesman in Finchley and Golders Green has been campaigning hard for the retention of that post office, having collected petitions containing more than 2,000 signatures. We are now offering the opportunity to Members across the House, in accordance with the campaigning sentiments that they have articulated both here and outside, to walk through the Lobby to give substance to those campaigns.

This is our second debate in Opposition time on this subject. The debate on 13 January led the Minister with responsibility for post office services to make an announcement on 5 February, of which the Secretary of State sought to make a virtue. Curiously, she declined to say that that amounted to a large vote of thanks to us for having raised the issue and creating the opportunity for that debate, from which that statement resulted, although that is clearly what happened.

That point was nailed by the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), who demonstrated that the "Westminster Newsletter" issued by the Post Office had stated, following the 13 January debate, that the Post Office would guarantee that it would "not make a decision until after the public consultation period, and will provide"

Members of Parliament

"with an explanation of the decision".

That announcement resulted from the statement made by the Minister that there would be no contract to "create any binding arrangement for closure until the public consultation has been completed."—[Official Report, 5 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 50WS.]

By any definitional interpretation of that, it is difficult to see why that guarantee would have been presented as a new development in the "Westminster Newsletter", unless there had been no guarantee before then. That is precisely the argument that we have been making, and I am glad that the Minister responded to it at the time in relation to the post office network.

All that we ask of the Secretary of State is that she listen again to the issues raised in this debate. It is jolly sporting of her to be with us today—

Mr. Hoyle: Cheap shot.

Mr. O'Brien: Labour Members might consider that a cheap shot, but the Secretary of State chose not to turn up to the last debate, although I, as her shadow, was leading it. The Minister both opened and wound up the debate on that occasion. There was clearly a mismatch there. More importantly, the Secretary of State should listen to the points being made in this debate on the way in which people experience post office services. We have heard countless examples from Members on both sides of the House of the deep concern and distress and of the grave inconvenience that has often been increased as a result of Government policy.

It is important to recognise that this is not simply an attempt by Her Majesty's Opposition to oppose for opposition's sake, although I am sure that the Secretary of State and the Minister would like to portray it as such. There are now countless early-day motions on this subject. I fully expect all those Members of the Opposition parties who have signed early-day motions 58, 431, 375, 725, 814, 826, 850 and 859 to join us in the Lobby. I also believe that the tens, if not hundreds, of Labour Members who have put their names to early-day motions on these issues—namely early-day motions 236, 373, 389, 397, 628, 648, 689, 549 and 797—should now think very carefully. This is a genuine opportunity for them to give an honest earnest of their campaigning through early-day motions in the Lobby tonight, rather than attempting to curry favour with a Government whom they always wish to congratulate. They stand up to make speeches and suggest that they are campaigning on behalf of their constituents, but they usually vote for the Government who have caused the problem in the first place.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is trying to entice us to vote for his motion, but it is really rather pathetic. It says nothing about post offices providing a vital public service or that they should be cross-subsidised in some kind of socialist way, which is what I believe. All that we have in the motion are proposals for more consultation and a bit of tinkering to try to make things work better. That is not enough.

Mr. O'Brien: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Of course, we would have been interested to see his proposed amendment to the motion, suggesting that his Government should support, in all honesty, the essence of socialism, which he is so keen to promote. The most important point is that he has an opportunity to give expression to what he has been campaigning on.

We have heard from many Members and it would be invidious, given the shortage of time, to try to mention them all, although, interestingly, my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) offered the Secretary of State a job swap. In the resulting exchange, she appeared keen to have the opportunity to be a sub-postmistress if she were not re-elected to this place. We are interested to hear of the candidacy of Mrs. Patel, her local sub-postmistress, whom we would much enjoy seeing in the House.

[Mr. O'Brien]

Apart from the community-led points and those on the criteria articulated by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle)—we hope that he will join us in the Lobby this evening—the most important point is that the Government have made a series of attempts to change the way that people get their services, which is convenient to and focused on them.

There is evidence of Government bias in terms of trying to force people to make a choice against their better instincts. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) made a telling point when he showed that the ready-for-work unemployed are not allowed to have the card account because, apparently, they have to be on the same basis as those who are waged in respect of bank accounts. Again, that is a restriction of choice. Given that the Secretary of State had no answer, that point rather nailed her.

We are short of time and there are a lot of questions to answer in the 10 minutes remaining. Although many have referred to Planet Hewitt I am far from wanting to do so, given that the Minister will make the winding-up speech. We must consider the fact that in Pond World it is indeed dark and a bit creepy. Pond World is also very wet and blind to the world on earth, as the rest of us—our constituents and Conservative Members at least—recognise.

What we see with our own eyes, through our constituency postbag, is deep concern about the restriction of choice and the Government's attempt to railroad people into behaving in a way that they feel is best for those people, rather than allowing people to behave in a way that they want to behave in and which they feel is best for them. They want certain services for themselves, and it is time that the Government listened. I hope that full account is taken of the debate so that we get another revision of Government policy, reflecting the will of the constituents whom we represent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): Never let it be said that the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) lacks either wit or wisdom.

We have had two parallel debates. The debate is entitled "Post Office Services", but almost all the contributions have been about direct payments. I want to address my initial remarks to that issue as we are going through a transfer to direct payment, which is a process of increasing customer choice, helping to address financial exclusion and improving access to financial services. That important point has hardly been mentioned this afternoon.

Before Christmas, I met with a number of groups representing those most vulnerable to financial and social exclusion, such as Help the Aged, Mind, Citizens Advice and the Royal National Institute of the Blind. I can tell the House that all welcomed our attempts to bring more people into the financial mainstream.

One of the main reasons that I came into politics was to combat the poverty and social exclusion that were made so much worse by the previous Government. Financial exclusion is an important aspect of those. I had to smile when the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) paraded himself as the friend of the poor and the pensioner. Labour Members remember precisely what he and the Conservative Government did in office.

The nostalgia for the days of order books that we heard from the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) is far removed from the drab reality that left 3.5 million of our citizens financially excluded. That is why Citizens Advice, which a number of Members, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, referred to, points out that financial exclusion is one of the main mechanisms for creating that social exclusion in neighbourhoods and communities and for making it so much more difficult to deal with the eradication of child poverty. It also points out that where people suffer from financial exclusion they also suffer from more general exclusion.

Mrs. Shephard: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Pond: No, I will make a little more progress.

That is one of the reasons why we are introducing a more modern, efficient and reliable service that increases customer choice, provides better value for the taxpayer—[Interruption]—yes it does, and cuts fraud and boosts financial inclusion. More customers have opted to have their benefits and pensions paid into an account than by order book and cheque, including 6 million people who are now having their pensions paid into an account without problems. Is any Conservative Member seriously suggesting that we now withdraw that choice from people in the vain hope that somehow it will keep local post offices open?

Andrew Selous: Will the Minister be good enough to acknowledge that no Conservative Member, or any Member, has called for everyone to go back to order books? We are calling for choice. We are just saying that those who want them should be able to keep them.

Mr. Pond: Good. We have that on the record then.

This Government believe very much in choice. We believe that post offices have a future as bright and welcoming places that provide high-quality services that people want to use and to which they want to return, not places to which people are tied in order to get their benefit or pension.

Mrs. Shephard: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Pond: I am afraid that time is tight, and I cannot.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden), the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton), the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) made points about the importance of their local post offices to their local communities, which we believe to be very important. That is why we are investing £2 billion in the post office network, with £450 million going into rural post offices.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have heard the concerns expressed about the consultation process. We have strengthened it, as she pointed out, but we recognise that people still have real concerns about the way in which those processes are being pursued. I advise hon. Members who are campaigning to maintain their post offices, as we are, to make absolutely sure that people continue to use those post offices, to encourage them to do so and to help them to recognise—

Mr. Hoyle: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments. Will he please ensure that there is fair play over the proposed closures of the two post offices in Chorley, and that there is genuine consultation?

Mr. Pond: We want to see genuine consultation. My right hon. Friend has confirmed that she is in favour of that.

The challenge for post offices is to make sure that they can offer a range of financial services that allow them to have a vibrant future, which will encourage people to go back to them. By contrast, the Conservative motion is both misguided and opportunistic. Post Office card accounts can only be opened at post office branches—that is the fact. The Government have encouraged customers to use the account that best meets their needs and circumstances. Those who say that it is difficult for people to open a Post Office card account should explain why 2 million people have already done so. All of my Department's direct payment leaflets mention the Post Office card account and how to apply for one. The Post Office has its own leaflets—

Mr. Bacon: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Pond: I have only two minutes and so am unable to do so.

We are making sensible changes, offering customers a genuine choice. We have listened to customers and their representatives to ensure that we provide a system that meets their individual needs. All customers who want to continue receiving their pension benefit or tax credit through the post office can do so, and they will be able to continue to do so just as now. In recognition of the fact that a small proportion of people will not be able to operate an account, we are developing and designing an exceptions service, and I have been discussing its characteristics with those organisations representing the groups most directly affected.

Mr. Bacon rose—

Mr. Pond: I cannot give way.

A number of Members have made points about Powergen. I know that both Powergen and my right hon. Friend will have heard them. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The Minister is replying.

Mr. Pond: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

My right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley suggested that there had been more crocodile tears from the Conservatives than would be necessary to raise the level of the Nile—

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended; to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports the Government's strategy to modernise the way benefits and pensions are paid, and to provide customers with a choice of accounts; welcomes the fact that with Direct Payment customers will still be able to collect their cash from the Post Office if they wish using a current account or basic bank account with Post Office access or the Post Office Card Account; notes the Government's plans for a cheque payment, cashable at post offices, for people who cannot be paid through an account; recognises that Direct Payment is a more modern, efficient and secure method of payment which will also help increase financial inclusion; welcomes the fact that more customers are now paid through an account than by order book without problems, including nearly six million pensioners; notes the previous government's attempt to introduce a Benefit Payment Card, which wasted millions of pounds of tax-payers' money; notes the fact that the Post Office had not until recently kept up with changes in customer demand and so had seen transaction volumes dropping and losses increasing; recognises the need for change and congratulates the Government for taking decisive action to help turn the business around; welcomes the record £2 billion investment in the Post Office network over a five-year period, including £450 million for the rural network and £210 million to modernise the urban network; and believes that this will help ensure a viable Post Office network that people will want to use.

DEFERRED DIVISION

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I now have to announce the results of the Division deferred from a previous day on the question relating to Fisheries: Catch Quotas and Effort Limitation 2004. The Ayes were 255 and the Noes were 149, so the Question was agreed to.

[The Division List is published at the end of today's debates.]

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill

Lords message considered [18 March]

Lords amendment 1D

4.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with Lords amendment 1D to Commons amendment 1C.

The amendment would abrogate the powers of this House of Commons and the Government to decide which regions to select for all-postal voting in the forthcoming local and European elections in June, and pass that decision to the Electoral Commission. It is yet another attempt by the other place to overturn the will of this House of Commons. It would be a nonsensical position for this House to adopt.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Leslie: Speaking of nonsensical, I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, although it is a pity that he cannot do so in the normal courteous way. I am sure that he was in his place earlier when the Deputy Prime Minister said that it was unacceptable for an unelected House to do what it is doing on this Bill. Why should we then rely so much, as the Government wish us to do, on the Electoral Commission, which is also unelected?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman aids my case. I do not want the House to accept Lords amendment 1D. We should not give the decision to the Electoral Commission. We have the responsibility as legislators to listen to its advice, but ultimately it is for us to accept or reject its advice. Indeed, the Electoral Commission has itself made that point. It does not want to make the decision. Sam Younger wrote to the Deputy Prime Minister only yesterday to say that its role was to advise. The letter says:

"the choice of pilot regions for all-postal voting is for Government and Parliament to decide. The Commission's role is . . . advisory and it is not for us to say yes or no to pilots in particular areas."

The Electoral Commission disagrees with the Government about the scale of postal voting. It feels that four regions are too many. The Government disagree, but it is for the House of Commons to reach a final conclusion. We have made our view known time and again, and it is now time to reiterate it.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for graciously giving way. What is the point of a reformed House of Lords, which we were told now had more authority, if every time that it comes up with a good idea, Ministers slap it down and vote it down?

Mr. Leslie: If the right hon. Gentleman seriously thinks that he can explain to his constituents that, no matter what they may want or for whom they may vote, they will not be able to secure reforms because the other place takes a different view and if he feels that that is a legitimate way for us to govern the country, surely the dividing lines between the two parties have never been any clearer.

As I have said, the Electoral Commission has made its views known about the scale of postal voting. We disagree with its view that four regions are too many and we feel that postal voting can go ahead in those regions. Yet the Electoral Commission has also said that, as well as the east midlands and the north-east proceeding, we should consider those regions that it defined as potentially suitable, including Yorkshire and the north-west. We wish to proceed with those two regions, thus making up the four regions that we recommend. The House has ratified that decision time and again.

Returning officers, especially in Yorkshire and the north-west, are now more resolute and more certain that they want to proceed with all-postal voting. Surely they are in the best position to know the ability of those regions to proceed. If they are telling us that they want to move ahead, not on the conventional basis but with all-postal voting, we should listen to them.

It would be remiss of us to neglect the fact that the referendums on elected regional government are approaching in October. The Electoral Commission has said that it welcomes postal voting in the three northern regions on that occasion, and we need to bear in mind the virtues of consistency between those referendums and what will take place in June. It would be wrong of us not to bear that in mind in the decisions that we take.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree with the estimate that probably an extra 2 million people would vote under the postal voting system compared with the traditional system? Has it occurred to him that the governing party is clearly on the side of increasing the number of people who vote, whereas the Opposition parties might be seeking tactical advantage by encouraging a diminution in that number?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend makes a reasonable point, and we need to start asking the Opposition parties why they have been using the other place to block what I regard as a perfectly reasonable innovation in our democracy that will ensure that we make it more convenient and easy for people to express their views in our constitution.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that we are hearing a lot about what the Electoral Commission and the Lords want, but not a lot about what voters want? Does he also agree that the vast majority of voters in Britain and in those regions want to use their postal votes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) has just suggested?

Mr. Leslie: The point that my hon. Friend makes stands well. We are elected to the House of Commons, which is where we are accountable to the population for the decisions that we take. If we decide to proceed with pilot all-postal voting in four regions, how can we explain to the electorate—our constituents—that we cannot manage to do so because the other place decides to thwart that view?

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is it not outright impertinence for those in the unelected Chamber to try to set down voting procedures when the House of Commons has made its decision? Should we not tell them so now?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend makes his point so strongly that it could be heard in the other Chamber as we speak. Indeed, it needs to be heard in the other Chamber. It is about time that we faced up to the fact that this House of Commons has made its view known and repeated its view, and that we now need to resolve the issue. We should not let the issue drift further. The Lords need to back down on this matter.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): It has quite rightly been stated that the matter before us is for this House to decide, because we are the elected House, we represent the people and we represent the electorate out there. Therefore, does my hon. Friend agree that this decision should be taken here, not by an unelected House, and certainly not by the Electoral Commission? I say to the Opposition—I think that my hon. Friend will confirm this—that Chorley has tried the pilot scheme for two years running and has doubled the number of people voting in wards by enfranchising them and allowing them to vote through a postal system. Why should they lose that right?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend hits the nail on the head. An important constitutional principle is at stake. The House of Commons has made its view known on a number of occasions, yet the second Chamber has been acting not in a revising capacity, but perhaps in a blocking capacity. He also made another point: if we are not careful and if the other place rows back from all-postal voting in four regions, fewer people might vote by all-postal means than in the 2003 local elections. Some 22 per cent. of the population voted by all-postal means in the 2003 elections. If we were to take the advice of some peers in the other place and drop the north-west, only 20 per cent. of the population would be proceeding in that way, which would obviously be seen as a retrograde step.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Will the Minister explain why, when his party introduced the Bill that became the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, it introduced in the Lords more than 300 amendments that had not been considered by this House, but which came back to this Chamber in a debate on a guillotine and were barely considered by the Commons at all?

Mr. Leslie: No legislation is enacted unless this House of Commons approves it. As the democratic Chamber, this House of Commons endorses all legislation. If the hon. Lady feels that any legislation has got on to the statute book without this House endorsing it, she can write to me and give me her suggestions. I feel that it is quite clear that any basic study of the constitution would conclude that this House needs to make its views known. She may disagree with the length of debate on a particular measure, but no legislation is introduced without this House giving its assent.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend take a little time to speculate on why both Opposition parties appear to be against making it as convenient as possible for people to vote?

Mr. Leslie: I can imagine a number of possible reasons, as I know my hon. Friend could. We should indeed think about that issue, and I shall turn to it in a moment.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Did my hon. Friend note that Baroness Hanham drew a comparison in her closing remarks between convenience and easiness in voting and increased turnout in elections? Is it not lamentable that someone who is neither elected nor accountable to anybody has such a contemptible view of democracy?

Mr. Leslie: It would be dangerous indeed if the other place were perceived to be making the democratic process any more difficult. Various people from other parties have made statements that perhaps we should make it more difficult for people to express their opinion and make it harder for them to vote at elections. That is fundamentally anti-democratic and the wrong approach.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Will the Minister explain how this House can give any opinion at all on amendments that are introduced in the other House and then subjected to a guillotine, ensuring that large numbers of them are not discussed at all? The guillotine is the means by which this Government have disfranchised large numbers of people.

Mr. Leslie: The right hon. Gentleman does not have to vote for any measure that he does not support. All measures can be voted on, and if he opposes a measure, he can vote against it. That is the fundamental way in which we make decisions in this House of Commons. We are not talking about guillotines in respect of this Bill; we are talking about a fundamental attempt by the other place to block the will of this House of Commons.

There are many good reasons why we should proceed with a pilot for four regions. We have the resources to do so, and a pilot involving 31 per cent. of the electorate is not excessive. Our decision is clear. We announced on 21 January that we wanted four regions, and the House of Commons ratified that decision on 8 March. It reconfirmed it on 16 March, so why are we debating it again? We have answered questions about fraud and malpractice, and made sure that we have answered questions about supported delivery points, where people can still vote in secret. New changes will aid voters in houses in multiple occupation, and teams of officials can visit such properties with special regard to the problems that can arise. Offences of personation and undue influence over voters are in place, and secrecy warnings will be included in the literature. We have therefore managed to address all the concerns about fraud and malpractice.

Regional returning officers have made their views very plain indeed, and want to proceed with all-postal voting. The Government want to proceed, and the House of Commons wants to proceed as well, so why are the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats trying to use the other place to block what is evidently the will of the House of Commons? I shall take up the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) and speculate on the reasons why.

The Opposition may be afraid of a high turnout in the June elections, and therefore oppose all-postal voting in the pilot. It may be the age-old tactic of opportunism, with the Opposition seeking to derail the local and European elections in June. If that is the true reason why the Opposition are behaving in that way, that is a very dangerous game indeed. The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and, in particular, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) must justify their use of the other place to block the will of the House of Commons. How am I to explain to my constituents in Yorkshire that, no matter how many people want all-postal voting and no matter who they vote for at those elections, they cannot have such a system because the minority parties, using the other place, have sought to block the will of the House of Commons?

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): The Minister referred to higher turnout and more people voting. Why is it not possible to have a nationwide postal vote? If there are pilot schemes for half the country, why are they in the north? What will the Minister say to people outside the House who will regard that as cynical manipulation?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman should know that we have debated the subject in the Chamber on numerous occasions, and he should be aware of the rationale for the Government's four-region proposal, which was supported by the Commons on a number of occasions. The selection partly reflects the advice of the Electoral Commission on the ranking of suitable regions, but takes into account the fact that in October we will hold referendums on elected regional government. It would be daft to ignore that.

Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): My hon. Friend mentioned the regional referendums in October and the use of all-postal ballots. Will he confirm that we will not necessarily have to accept the unhelpful amendment on regional referendums agreed in the House last week making extra requirements for witness signature? In the postal ballots in my area of Gateshead, we had no such requirement. The turnout was higher than it was in areas where the requirement was made, and the Electoral Commission gave us a clean bill of health regarding fraud—we had no problems of that kind. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend can give me that assurance.

Mr. Leslie: I know that my right hon. Friend is disappointed that we were effectively forced to accede to the Lords on the declaration of identity, but we did so in the spirit of trying to reach consensus, even though that does not appear to have been acknowledged by the other place. It is important to keep under review the issue of the declaration of identity. It will be used in the all-postal voting pilots in June, but we should revisit the issue.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Labour Members seem to suggest that we are against high turnouts, but I dare that say every single Opposition Member was elected on a higher turnout than every single Labour Member. The Minister suggests that there is some mystery about why the Lords keep sending the Bill back and why the House of Commons cannot have its way. Will he address the Electoral Commission's letter of yesterday—not a month ago, not two months ago, but yesterday—in which it continues to say that it does not recommend holding postal votes in the north-west? The Government set up the Electoral Commission to guard the integrity of the electoral process. Will he address the specific concerns of the Electoral Commission and tell us why he thinks that it has got this wrong?

Mr. Leslie: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I have the letter from Sam Younger, the chairman of the Electoral Commission. It does not contain the words that the hon. Gentleman attributed to it—that we should definitely not go ahead with the north-west. The Electoral Commission simply says that its views on all these matters have not changed from the previous occasion. We know very well that the Electoral Commission has said that the north-west is potentially suitable.

The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the commission has reiterated its view. He knows that we disagree about a number of regions, and I do not demur from that, but it is important to remember that the Electoral Commission has reiterated that there are a number of regions that it considered "potentially suitable". The commission underlines the fact that it is for the Government, Parliament and the House of Commons to make decisions about what happens and which regions should be selected. It is not for the commission to say yes or no to particular regions. That is in the letter.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Electoral Commission's letter of yesterday to the Deputy Prime Minister states:

> "For the reasons set out in my letter of 4 March we are not persuaded of the merits of piloting in 4 regions."

It goes on to say:

> "The considerations as set out in our December Report regarding the North West have not changed."

The Minister is indulging in his usual habit of selective quotation and misinterpretation. It is quite clear that the Electoral Commission was against a pilot in the north-west for all the reasons of fraud that it set out before. It still says that it is against the north-west. Will the Minister recognise that?

Mr. Leslie: I can only sit at the feet of the master of selective quotation. That is certainly not what I understand from the Electoral Commission. I have said to the hon. Gentleman that we disagree with the Electoral Commission about its view of the number, the quantum, the scale of regions to proceed with, but that is an entirely different matter from which particular regions are selected. The Electoral Commission underlined the fact that it had a category of regions that were "potentially suitable", which include Yorkshire and the north-west. It has not changed its view. That remains the case. It is therefore open to us to recommend that we should proceed in four regions.

We have been round these arguments before and I do not think many of the issues have changed. What has changed is the fact that the Opposition parties seek to justify using the blocking powers of the other place to thwart the will of the House of Commons. How can the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, for example, call himself a Liberal Democrat but use the House of Lords as he has done to thwart the House of Commons' views and decisions? He should address that point when he speaks. [Interruption.]

The benefits of all-postal voting are clear—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. May I say to the House as a whole that it would be better if the debate were conducted with one person speaking at a time?

Mr. Leslie: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The benefits of all-postal voting are crystal clear. It brings convenience and ease of voting to electors in those regions. We are talking merely about piloting. We should pilot in those four regions. The arguments are clear. I hope that the House stands firm in its view and supports the proposal for four regions, and I urge hon. Members to disagree with the Lords in their amendment.

Mr. Hawkins: We are going around this track for the fifth or sixth time now, but there are always some new developments. The Government have conceded one of our main concerns about the anti-fraud measure of requiring a witness signature. I am sorry that they refused to concede on the sending of receipts by returning officers, but I suspect that the House will need to return to that in years to come, and I fear that, as the Electoral Reform Society has warned, the incidence of electoral fraud will require a reconsideration of that.

Anyone who had heard only the Minister's speech this afternoon might mistakenly think that the Government's views on this matter were entirely clear and had never changed, but in fact the Government have changed their mind from three pilot regions to four, at the insistence, as we know, of the Deputy Prime Minister, who has been working the issue by remote control throughout the passage of the Bill.

The main issue this afternoon, however, is the Government's refusal to trust the Electoral Commission, which they themselves set up. The Government have tried to bully their own Electoral Commission, and they have done so specifically and especially in the person of the Deputy Prime Minister. We always suspected that his involvement in this area was for purely party political reasons, and we saw it for ourselves last week, when he spent the whole time on the Front Bench bellowing and seeking to interrupt and affect the debate.

We have now all seen the letters that the chairman of the Electoral Commission, Sam Younger, sent to the Minister on 4 March, and to the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday. Significantly, what we have not seen are the letters that Ministers, specifically the Deputy Prime Minister, have sent to the Electoral Commission. I challenge the Minister to place in the Library the letters that all Ministers have sent to the Electoral Commission, because before the matter returns to another place, we all need to have a full picture. I also challenge the Minister, as I did last week, when he declined to respond, to place in the Library the minutes of all meetings that any Minister in this Government has attended with any returning officers. We need a full picture. At the moment we are seeing the responses of the chairman of the Electoral Commission to letters that we have not seen.

We also fear that Labour has been leaning on returning officers—not only in the Deputy Prime Minister's home area of Yorkshire and the Humber—to seek to intimidate them into changing their views. It is not merely Conservative Members who express these views. As the noble Lord Rennard, speaking for the Liberal Democrats, said:

"it is alarming that a Labour Government can engage so directly with returning officers charged with conducting the elections fairly, but who are the employees of Labour councils fearful of their re-election and who can exclude the independent Electoral Commission from those deliberations."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 March 2004; Vol. 1942, c. 345.]

That is our concern.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman referred in his opening remarks to incidents of fraud. Would he like to give some examples of where such incidents have taken place, because as my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin) pointed out earlier, in Gateshead council, where the ballot took place without the need for witness signatures, there was no evidence whatever of fraud. On the other hand, in Newcastle council, where the witness signature was required, 6,000 people were disfranchised because of the lack of a witness signature. Does he think that that is fair?

Mr. Hawkins: I do not criticise the hon. Gentleman because I know that he has many responsibilities in the House, but I do not think that he took part in the earlier debates on this matter. Had he done so, he would be aware that I have referred at great length to the examples of fraud given by the noble Lord Greaves, not just on one but on several occasions when the matter was debated in another place. I have incorporated my concerns, which are set out fully by the Electoral Commission in its report, in my various speeches, so I respectfully refer the hon. Gentleman to what the Lord Greaves has said. The main concerns about fraud were in the north-west. The Electoral Commission says that one of its concerns about the north-west is that possible prosecutions for fraud might coincide with the period of these elections; that has been one of the main reasons why it is not prepared to approve the north-west as a pilot area.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): Again, the hon. Gentleman comments on the north-west and the allegations made by Lord Greaves. Will he clear up the matter: has the Crown Prosecution Service taken forward any of the allegations made in Pendle?

Mr. Hawkins: I do not know specifically about Pendle, but, as the hon. Gentleman would know if he had listened to earlier debates, Lord Greaves did not refer only to Pendle, and I, like him, gave about 10 different examples of areas of the north-west where fraud had been alleged. The Government's own Electoral Commission has said that it is not prepared to endorse the suggestion that the north-west should be a pilot because of concerns about fraud, and yesterday's letter from Sam Younger, the chairman of the Electoral Commission, repeats that point.

Andy Burnham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hawkins: I will not give way again. I simply refer the hon. Gentleman to yesterday's letter from Sam Younger, which is absolutely clear, no matter how the Minister tries to reinterpret it. In December, the Electoral Commission said that the north-west is inappropriate; it repeated the point in January; and it made it again as recently as yesterday.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Why does the hon. Gentleman take the view that we should take so much notice of the Electoral Commission, when the Lords and he rejected its suggestion on the verification of voting? He is keen to take notice of the Electoral Commission when he wants to. Why did he not take notice on both occasions?

Mr. Hawkins: The Government must explain why they are ignoring their own Electoral Commission. It was not us who set it up. Having listened to the Minister this afternoon, one might think that it is Government policy to ignore the fact that we have a bicameral legislature. The Government want a one-party, one-Chamber state, where they can ram through their views without debate.

In fairness, many of the noble Lords and Baronesses who have spoken about electoral matters in debates on this Bill have many more years of electoral experience than the Minister. Many of them are in another place precisely because they have long experience as councillors and party agents. [Interruption.] The Minister says that noble Lords and Baronesses have no electoral mandate, but many of them have been around in politics for a lifetime and sit in another place because of their experience. [Interruption.] He should recognise that it is a bit rich for somebody who only arrived in this House in 1997 to criticise as having no mandate those from whichever party who have been appointed to another place because of their political experience.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the case that every Member of this House, irrespective of age and experience, is of equal status?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members are, of course, of equal status, but they may have different experience in different ways. I do not want to get involved in a matter of debate—far worse things have been said in the House, and we can always seek to improve the standard of exchange. While I am on the subject, I want to hear less noise and more from the person who has the Floor of the House at the time.

Mr. Hawkins: We must examine what independent commentators say about what the Government are up to in trying to railroad the Bill through. I refer any hon. Members who have not seen them yet to the views expressed by the distinguished and senior home affairs correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, Mr. Phillip Johnston, on Monday of this week. In a well-observed column headed, "'Now they want to abolish polling day", Mr. Johnston says:

"Surely this is a matter that requires all-party agreement. The electoral system is no more Labour's to tinker around with than is the constitution, whose ancient structures are being so casually dismantled in the name of 'modernisation'. Postal voting, while superficially attractive to politicians who think that we are all too bone idle to get off our backsides to go to a polling station, is wide open to fiddling, intimidation and fraud. It will mark the final disconnection between politicians and the electorate."

Mr. Johnston also deals with the canard that we heard at Prime Minister's questions earlier this afternoon, when an hon. Member suggested to the Deputy Prime Minister that postal ballots might mean fewer votes for extremist parties. As Mr. Johnston points out,

"The seats with the highest turnout in the 2001 general election were the three Northern Ireland constituencies where Sinn Fein candidates were elected."

Does not that give the lie to the suggestion that an increase in turnout means less support for extremists?

5.15 pm

Mr. Miller: To correct the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), I had a bigger turnout and a bigger absolute vote than the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins).

Does the hon. Member for Surrey Heath agree that although the article from The Daily Telegraph is right inasmuch as the voting system is not Labour's to tinker with, it is for this House to make a decision, and this House must take precedence over the other place, where nobody is elected?

Mr. Hawkins: I simply disagree with the hon. Gentleman. We take the view that the whole purpose of having a bicameral legislature is to give both Houses of Parliament a role. What we dislike is this Government's attempt to change the agenda as it suits them. During the debate on the Bill on 16 December, the Minister said—not once, not twice, not three times, but about six times—that the Government would have a third postal pilot. The volte face took place as soon as the Deputy Prime Minister got involved and insisted that both the north-west and Yorkshire and Humber be included. The Government have been completely inconsistent for party political reasons connected with the Deputy Prime Minister's obsession with the forthcoming referendums on regional government.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Lords is particularly important when a strong majority party in this House wishes to twist or distort the constitution or the electoral system? That is when the minority interests and parties need a voice. I am delighted that the Lords will provide that; the Government should be ashamed that they will not.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend: he is absolutely right.

We can rely on the Electoral Commission's firm view—despite the Minister's attempt to reinterpret it—that the north-west must be ruled out. The Electoral Commission is clear that it has not changed its mind from what it said in December or in January, and sticks to the reasons that it set out previously. That is why those in another place are absolutely right to continue to insist on backing the Electoral Commission. I am confident that in the end the Government will have to give up on this, because otherwise they will lose the Bill altogether. If they do, it will be entirely their own fault.

Mr. Clelland: My hon. Friend the Minister is right to resist the amendments, especially in light of the damage that has already been done to the Bill by the other House. The amendment requiring witness signatures, which will disfranchise thousands of people—mainly the elderly and those with communication difficulties—has been forced on the Government because the other place is using up time which, because of the approaching elections, this House unfortunately does not have, in order to defeat the Bill. Last week, the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister interviewed manufacturers of electoral materials who are telling the Government that time is running out in terms of producing those materials. The House of Lords is using that situation to force amendments on a reluctant Government.

Much comment has been made about the unelected House having undue influence over a matter relating to elections and electors' rights. Some might say that that makes the case for an elected House stronger. I would argue against that, because one can imagine the situation if these decisions were being made by an elected House. It would be much more difficult for this House to get anything through at all—we would have this legislative gridlock time after time. The Government are right to go back to the drawing board on the constitution of the second Chamber. [Interruption.] One of my hon. Friends says, "Abolish them." I am becoming more attracted to that idea as the days go by. We need to consider the powers of the House of the Lords before we start to consider who should sit and exercise them. That is what should have been done in the first place. I hope that we will take this opportunity to do it and that we do not get into this ridiculous situation again.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That was a briefer contribution from the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) than I was expecting, but it was valued nevertheless.

These ping-pong episodes are among the most unedifying things that we do in the House. As I said when we last debated these matters, it is rare to hear any new arguments on these occasions. However, there is a new element this time, in the form of the letter from the Electoral Commission, which the Minister has chosen to misrepresent to the House, and whose contents he has chosen to ignore. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] Hon. Members may say "Rubbish", but I have the faculty of being able to read. No Member who has read the letter from the Electoral Commission can be in any doubt as to what its conclusions are, and that poses a huge problem for the Government. The Lords have not introduced a killer amendment to the Bill. All that they have done is to make the perfectly reasonable propositions that the Electoral Commission, which the Government set up in order to give advice on electoral matters, should be heard on this matter, and that the Government should not be able to ignore its advice when introducing electoral pilots. Indeed, "pilot" is an inappropriate word to use when the proposal involves nearly half the local authorities in England. That is not a pilot; it is half the country.

We have heard the absurd argument that it would be a disgrace to democracy if there were no all-postal ballot in the north-west. However, we are not told that it would be a disgrace to democracy not to have one in the south-west. We are told that such a ballot is essential in the east midlands, but not the west midlands. [HON. MEMBERS: "Pilots!"] We now hear the word "pilots", but the three pilots that the Minister asked for in the first place are no longer sufficient. The Government, in the form of the Deputy Prime Minister, have determined that he wants half of England to be involved, and that just happens to be the half that lies to the north of the Trent.

I do not understand why the Deputy Prime Minister is so adamant that he should use the majority in the House to push through an electoral reform against the consensus of the political parties represented in the House and against the advice of the Electoral Commission. There was a time when there was a pretence that the Deputy Prime Minister was not guiding this whole affair, but that pretence has been blown apart by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has written to the Electoral Commission—we know not in what terms—and that he has had a rebuttal from it. The commission will not be persuaded that it should abandon its better judgment in this matter.

Having made a careful study of Yorkshire and Humber, the commission has said that its view has changed, and that it is now prepared to accept that Yorkshire and Humber is an appropriate area. Very well. If that is the case, I accept that as well. I have no wish not to extend this voting experiment to those areas in which it is suitable to do so. Let me tell hon. Members from Yorkshire and Humberside that I am now on their side, because they have the imprimatur of the Electoral Commission.

Mr. Watts: Is it Liberal Democrat policy that the Electoral Commission should be able to overrule the will of Parliament? Also, will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the view of the Liberal Democrat MEP, Chris Davies, is that postal voting is for lazy people? Does the hon. Gentleman believe that anyone who wants a postal vote is a lazy person?

Mr. Heath: No, I do not believe that. Frankly, it was an absurd thing for that Member of the European Parliament to say, and I wish he had not said it. Now that I have said that from the Front Bench, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will no longer try to use that argument in evidence against our party's apparent position. It is not the position of our party.

Mr. George Osborne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: In a moment. Let me answer one intervention at a time.

The role of the Electoral Commission is crucial when designing pilot schemes for innovative ways of voting. I would never have had a problem with the Government had they said, "We are not having a pilot scheme for this innovation. We will have a UK-wide all-postal ballot." I would have said, "Okay, let's have a go and see what happens in the European elections." However, that is not what is on offer. We have the absurd pretence that, somehow, the Government are doing as is recommended when we know that they are not and that this is appropriate for one part of the country and not appropriate for the rest.

Mrs. Browning: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Electoral Commission and its chairman are answerable not to Ministers but to the House? I sit on the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. The commission is called to our meetings to answer questions. If, as a member of that Committee, I discovered that the chairman had made a specific recommendation to the Government vis-à-vis fraud in the north-west and they had ignored it, they would be in very serious trouble with my Committee.

Mr. Heath: Let that be a warning to the Minister, because he is clearly going to be in trouble with the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission.

Hyperbole apart, this is a serious matter. We are discussing this country's electoral system and that should command the respect and agreement, as far as that is possible, of the parties that are contesting those elections. It is simply not right that a party that has a majority in the House—owing to what I think is a corrupt electoral system, and certainly on a minority of the vote—can have its way irrespective of the views of the Electoral Commission that it appointed.

Mr. Leslie: I have two brief comments to make. First, I hope that the hon. Gentleman withdraws his point about the House somehow being based on a corrupt democratic system. Secondly, will he justify the use of the House of Lords in persistently overturning the will of the House of Commons?

Mr. Heath: Perhaps the Minister uses the House of Lords for his purposes; I do not use the House of Lords. I respect the judgment of those who sit in the House of Lords at the moment, although I would like it to be reformed and given accountability through a proper electoral system.

I say that the system is corrupt because it does not reflect the votes that people cast, as the Minister perfectly well knows. That is why he can pray in aid a massive majority in the House won on a minority of the votes cast and say that it should overrule not only Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members of this House, but the other House, which he has chosen not to reform, as well as the independent body that was set up precisely—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Heath: Many Members want to intervene, but I give way to the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin), because I think I did her a disservice during a previous debate in not understanding the details of the pilot scheme in her constituency. I apologise to her for that.

Joyce Quin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who did not realise that the pilots are different in different areas. In my area, there is no requirement for a witness signature. He has laid great emphasis on supporting the Electoral Commission, but is it not the case that last week the amendment from the other place, which he introduced and which was accepted, ran counter to the view of the Electoral Commission regarding the witness signature?

Mr. Heath: You would rule us out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if we re-ran a debate on an amendment that has been passed into the legislation. [Interruption.] If I may, I will respond to the right hon. Lady. I am clear in my mind that the advice from the Electoral Commission was that we should have a pre-registration identity system. We have not yet achieved that. I understand from her what the pilot scheme in her constituency involves, which I did not understand before. I admit my ignorance on that. However, it does not alter the fact that for the generality of elections around the country, and for all those that would have lain outside the pilot regions in the election that we are debating, exactly the same system would have persisted. It does not therefore invalidate my argument, although I was incorrect in the detail, which is why I am happy to offer my apologies.

5.30 pm

Andy Burnham: I think that the hon. Gentleman was beginning to develop an argument that he would accept Yorkshire but not the north-west. Can he therefore confirm that the only outstanding case of electoral fraud ongoing in the north-west is against a Liberal Democrat in a traditional election opportunity?

Mr. Heath: I cannot confirm that, although I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right, as he has a more intimate knowledge of electoral affairs in the north-west than I do. I have never used the argument used by others that the key issue in the north-west is fraud. My argument has always related to one of the basic criteria set down by the Government, not me, that given the complexity of electoral arrangements in the north-west and that so many local authority elections are involved in the north-west, it is not an appropriate pilot. That is what the Electoral Commission said about the north-west, and that is the position to which it holds.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether my position was developing. In terms of identification of the regions, my position has always been that we accept the advice of the Electoral Commission, which originally proposed two regions, and has moved its position to accept Yorkshire and Humber. I am therefore happy to adopt that position today.

Andy Burnham: Is it not the case that the Liberal Democrats are singing two different tunes from one end of the Corridor to the other? The noble Lord Greaves has made great play of fraud in the north-west elections, which is why the Liberal Democrats have opposed this Bill down the other end of the Corridor. The hon. Gentleman is now advancing a different argument. Which is it? Clearly, there is no evidence of fraud in postal ballots in the north-west. To what are the Liberal Democrats opposed?

Mr. Heath: Again, the hon. Gentleman is referring to a previous debate. We are not talking about fraud today, because, I gently remind him, we have dealt with that issue. We are now talking about the selection of regions and only the selection of regions. The burden of our argument has always been that having set up an independent arbiter as to which region should be selected for a pilot and how many regions should be so selected, the Government are deciding that they know better than that independent arbiter, for whatever reason they wish to use.

Mr. Watts rose—

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Heath: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman, but I will give way to the hon. Lady if she still wants to intervene on me.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: As someone who shares the hon. Gentleman's support for electoral reform, may I ask whether he will accept my fundamental disappointment at the way in which Liberal Democrats in this place and the other place have handled this issue? First, they are saying that voters in Rochdale are too stupid to understand how a postal vote system would work. Secondly, what is the difference between the Yorkshire local government system and north-west local government system if he is seeking to say that it is more complicated, we are too stupid and we cannot understand it? And thirdly, does he not understand that there is just a tinge of hypocrisy to allowing the argument to be advanced in the other place, but not advancing it in this place, thereby allowing those in the other place to do your dirty work?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Lady clearly did not listen to the reply that I just gave. We have had a debate on electoral fraud, which has now been resolved, and we are now debating one amendment from the other place that deals only with the selection of regions. If she wants to say that accepting the advice of the Electoral Commission on Yorkshire and Humber in some way demeans or derides her constituents in the north-west, why are my constituents, who had an all-postal ballot at the elections last year, too stupid to have an all-postal ballot in these elections? Does she have an answer to that?

Mrs. Fitzsimons: The problem was pointed out by one of my hon. Friends earlier. It suited your purposes when you tabled an amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady, in her excitement, is not using the right language. None of this has anything to do with the Chair.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that there is some confusion among the Liberal Democrats. Last week, when they tabled an amendment, they disagreed with the Electoral Commission. This week, they have decided that its recommendations are their bible. Which is it?

Mr. Heath: I am not going to keep replying to the same intervention ad nauseam. The hon. Lady really needs to talk to her hon. Friends about the internal contradictions in their own arguments. Then she can start talking to me.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way? He said earlier that he would.

Mr. Heath: Oh, did I? Well, in that case I had better.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman just mentioned contradictions. Can he tell us why the Liberal Democrats accept the prospect of an all-out postal vote in the referendum that will take place in October, but do not accept the proposal for postal votes in the local government and European elections in the north-west in June?

Mr. Heath: Can the right hon. Gentleman explain to me why this is called the European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill? That is the crux of the matter. As I have said more times than I care to remember, I would have understood the Government's logic if they had applied their proposals to the European parliamentary elections as a whole.

Kali Mountford: That is not a pilot.

Mr. Heath: Half of England is not a pilot. That is the problem with the Government's position.

Sadly, I do not think that we are making any progress. The reason for that is the Government's intransigence and incompetence. The proposal will now go to the other place, and a deal will be done. The Lords will accept Yorkshire and Humberside, or the Government will lose their Bill. Then we shall have the three regions that the Electoral Commission has identified as suitable, and the Government will have the three pilots that they said they wanted in the first instance. Why on earth could they not have said that here this evening? Because they want the Lords to take the blame for their incompetence.

Kali Mountford: I must start by agreeing with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). It is sad that we can agree on the fact that we are making no progress whatever. This House should be allowed to make progress, because this House has made its position clear. This House contains the democratically elected representatives of our constituents, and the other House does not. I should have thought that that was of some importance to this House.

That is important to this House because we are discussing how it should formulate elections for the future, and what will happen when we change an electoral system that has a direct bearing on its work, and a less direct bearing on the work of the other place. The line has been revealed by statements made in the other place. The Lords do not object to a pilot, or even to the number of areas included in the pilot; they are against postal balloting per se. Their main objection is to the fact that elections would be more convenient. What an absurd objection! It is absurd to suggest that a disabled person, a person who works very hard or a person who works different shifts should not have the right to a postal vote.

Incidentally, all those people can apply for a postal vote under the current system. As they can do that on an individual basis, with all the expense that that entails, why is it not sensible to think about what will happen when that convenience is extended to everyone, and the distortion caused by the requirement for applications is removed?

Andy Burnham: We have heard of the great experience at the other end of the Corridor. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Lords vote was carried by the hereditary peers? What right have they to advise any Member of this House, whatever his or her age, about electoral practice?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind both hon. Members of the precise terms of the amendment.

Kali Mountford: I will limit myself to saying how much I agree with what my hon. Friend has said, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We must ask what benefit will accrue from the pilot, who will be included, and why this House should or should not take cognisance of what is said in the other place and what is said by the Electoral Commission. We are surely not saying in this debate that we should have government by commission. That would be absurd. It is for this House and this Government to take account of what advice the Electoral Commission gives, but then to make up our own minds on the value of that advice—with some of which we agree and with some of which we do not agree. It is perfectly sensible to say that we want the pilots to cover a larger area, and to include more circumstances against which we can check the outcome. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome kept saying that half the electorate would be included in the pilot, but that is incorrect. If he cannot do his sums, he should look at the figures again. By my reckoning, 31 per cent. is not half.

Mr. Watts: I agree with my hon. Friend. Does she share my lack of understanding of how the Liberal

[Mr. Watts]

Democrats can support postal voting in referendums on regional government, but not in European or local elections? Are not those two stances at odds with each other?

Kali Mountford: It is hardly surprising that the Liberal Democrats are at odds on any issue. It is hardly surprising that they have hung themselves on a particular hook over the precise terms of this afternoon's debate. It suits them to forget the convenient arguments that they have used on other issues at other times. Nevertheless, let us examine what they have said. They have said that what is good enough for the goose is not good enough for the gander. I say that this gander will have its way.

Mr. Redwood: The proposal from the House of Lords is a modest and reasonable compromise, when the Government are trying to ride roughshod over minority party interests and the interests of anyone who wishes to see sensible reform at a steady pace. I do not speak as one who is against postal ballots in principle; in theory, they are very good. The problem is the practice, because there are a number of genuine concerns about whether such ballots can be administered fairly and well, without corruption, pressure, personation and all the other problems that any true democrat abhors.

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Question put, That this House disagrees with Lords amendment 1D to Commons amendment 1C:—

Equitable Life Inquiry

[Relevant document: the oral evidence taken before the Treasury Committee on Tuesday 16th March, on the Equitable Life Inquiry, HC 71-iv, Session 2003–04.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now Adjourn.—[Ruth Kelly.]

5.59 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The House will recall that the origin of the Equitable Life inquiry carried out by Lord Penrose was the financial crisis experienced by the society in July 2001, when it closed to new business and cut policy values. The inquiry's terms of reference were to inquire into the circumstances of the Equitable Life assurance society, taking account of the relevant life market background, to identify the lessons to be learned for the conduct and administration of life assurance business, and to give a report thereon to Treasury Ministers.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): On the lessons learned, the Financial Secretary will be aware that Lord Penrose found that regulatory failure was the fundamental reason for, if not the primary cause of, the company's financial crisis. Is it now Government policy never to consider compensation where there has been regulatory failure of any sort?

Ruth Kelly: If the hon. Gentleman were to acquaint himself in greater depth with the contents of the report, he would see that Lord Penrose says specifically that regulatory system failures failed policyholders in this case. He does not point to operational failure. However, I shall deal with that point later.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway), can the Financial Secretary envisage any circumstances in which there would be a case for the Government to pay compensation to policyholders? Or would she rule out the payment of compensation in any circumstances that she could foresee?

Ruth Kelly: I have considered in great depth the contents of Lord Penrose's report. Lord Penrose makes no recommendation for compensation. He finds no instance of maladministration by the regulator, nor does he make any allegation of negligence by the regulator. The Treasury has also examined the contents of its report. We see no reason to think that the regulator was negligent or that there was any maladministration at any time while the society was being regulated by the Treasury or, indeed, under the previous regime.

Clearly, the Treasury cannot underwrite every business in the country. No regulator can ever provide a 100 per cent. guarantee against failure. However, Lord Penrose says that blame would have to be apportioned through the court system. He says:

"It was not for me to measure any person's actions against accepted standards of conduct defining the legal duties of other people performing comparable duties in other organisations and other similar circumstances."

He considers that

"Breach of duty, and the financial consequences of breach, are properly matters for the established courts of justice and for other appropriate tribunals in the financial sector."

That is not my analysis, but the analysis of Lord Penrose himself. He finds that, from the early 1970s, the society embarked on a growth strategy that resulted in the progressive financial weakening of the society, such that its ability to meet the long-term expectations of its policyholders was in doubt from the late 1980s onwards.

Lord Penrose describes how the company deliberately ran down its inherited estate and then, in the 1980s, moved into deficit to keep up bonus levels and win market share. According to Lord Penrose, sustained growth became an independent objective pursued with something approaching missionary zeal. He adds:

"Bonus policy became central to achieving the Society's marketing objectives"

and that

"the surplus published by the Society became a function of the desired level of bonus."

He outlines how, in 1973, the society introduced the concept of a terminal bonus and then, in the 1980s, progressively shifted the bonus mix away from annual guaranteed reversionary bonuses towards terminal bonuses, which were not covered by reserves. That allowed the society to inflate bonus levels to a level higher than available assets would have implied.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Does the Financial Secretary accept that the financial condition of Equitable Life was much worse in 1997, 1998 and 1999 than it was some years earlier and that that gave the regulators a much greater opportunity to intervene and take action to try to protect policyholders in the late 1990s than at any time earlier?

Ruth Kelly: I could quote from Lord Penrose's report on that point, but I shall quote from the independent authority of the ombudsman, who considered that specific period. She says:

"There is no doubt that in late 1998 the Treasury had briefed FSA in considerable detail about Equitable's weak regulatory solvency position and had indicated a possible need for the regulator to intervene . . . it is very evident . . . the prudential regulators' stated approach to their role . . . could not be criticised for a lack of concern about Equitable and the position of their policyholders nor could their approach in respect of Equitable be described as 'passive'."

Lord Penrose writes:

"By disregarding accrued terminal bonus, the Society was able to over-allocate bonus beyond available assets at market value, and in particular to make payments on claims that exceeded the relative available assets at the time".

By 1989, according to Lord Penrose:

"the Society deliberately distributed a high proportion of the available return for market-related reasons, and entered the 1990s with a negative estate accordingly."

The society was therefore unable to withstand the financial implications of the House of Lords judgment in the Hyman case.

Lord Penrose says:

"Superficially claims of £1.5 billion should not have brought down a society with funds of £32 billion."

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend will know that Lord Penrose appeared before the Treasury Committee last week and said that the society was largely the author of its own misfortune. However, on the very point made by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), I hope that my hon. Friend will be aware of Chris Headdon's interview on Radio 4 this morning, when he said that Lord Penrose did not find any evidence of concealment. She will also be aware of the financial reinsurance product—the side letter—that Chris Headdon had, of which the Financial Services Authority was not aware. Indeed, the FSA has said that, if it had been aware of the side letter, it would not have guaranteed anything with regard to the society. Does that not raise questions about a deliberate policy of concealment on behalf of the executive in Equitable Life?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes some very interesting points. Of course it is not for me to comment on any action that may be taken by the FSA, the prosecution wing of the Department of Trade and Industry or the Serious Fraud Office, although he will be aware that Lord Penrose has forwarded his report to the SFO. Lord Penrose is clear that a unique situation was developing at Equitable Life. He states:

"The Society's uniqueness lay in the approach adopted by its management, not in the essential characteristics of its business."

With regard to the reinsurance treaty, Lord Penrose is absolutely clear as well that

"Those involved at the society were not in any doubt that a right for the reinsurer to cancel in those circumstances would undermine the regulatory value of the agreement."

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Did the regulators not require the reinsurance provision, and was not the response of the people who then had control of the society to threaten to sue the regulators?

Ruth Kelly: Again, my hon. Friend makes an extremely valid point. Reinsurance treaties were granted relatively routinely, but he draws attention to, in effect, the difficult relationship that existed between the regulators and the society over quite a long period, under the stewardship of the FSA, the Treasury and, indeed, the DTI before that, particularly in relation to guaranteed annuity rates.

I should make it clear to the House that the Government sympathise with the plight of policyholders who have suffered not only much worry and distress over the past few years, but significant reductions in their expected income in retirement as a result of those issues. As I outlined to the House in my statement on 8 March, Lord Penrose finds that that weakening of the society was made possible by a culture of manipulation and concealment on the part of the company's previous senior management. The report details how executive management failed to keep the board fully informed about the true state of the company's financial position.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Financial Secretary will be aware that hundreds of thousands of people around the country are suffering as a result of that extremely unfortunate situation. Those people acted in good faith and have done nothing wrong. What have the Government got to offer them, other than sympathy?

Ruth Kelly: The key conclusion to draw from Lord Penrose's report is not only the one to which my hon. Friends have pointed—

"Principally, the Society was the author of its own misfortunes"

as Lord Penrose says—but that, as he also says:

"If the proposals in hand for the future of the new regulatory regime are implemented and if they are effective in practice, the major criticisms of the earlier regulatory regime will have been addressed both in relation to the general approach to regulation and in relation to the particular issues arising from discussion of regulation of the Society."

So policyholders throughout the country, both in the society and in other life assurance societies, as well as in financial services more generally, can be reassured that Lord Penrose himself concludes that the FSA reforms introduced by this Government, which started in 1997, were the ones that have put the regulatory system on to a fair basis and that can address these issues.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Although Lord Penrose states that the society was the author of its own misfortunes, he goes on to say:

"Regulatory systems failures were secondary".

Does the Minister accept the proposition that a secondary cause can none the less be a significant issue? The fact that a cause is secondary does not mean that it is non-existent. Should not the Government take some responsibility for that secondary cause, which was a failure?

Ruth Kelly: I shall deal with the regulatory system failure in great detail later in my speech. Profound lessons for the House arise from Lord Penrose's report, and I am sure that when the hon. Gentleman reflects on its contents, he will also reflect on his role in these affairs.

Lord Penrose states:

"Substantial amounts of technical and financial information were provided to the Board . . . These failed fully to present the overall financial position of the Society, and in particular the risks inherent in the policies that were pursued in relation to bonus allocation".

He finds that

"the Board's understanding of the annuity guarantee issue was at best limited until the Autumn of 1997, and some directors may not have had any understanding of the position."

He also states:

"Arguably the first and most significant failure in this report lay at the heart of the Society . . . The Board at no stage got fully to grips with the financial situation faced by the Society: information was too fragmented, their collective skills were inadequate for the task, and there were no effective arrangements for ensuring that there was detailed examination of, and onward reporting to the Board on, actuarial reports."

Lord Penrose notes that there were

"executive directors with relevant actuarial qualifications but little or no relevant experience".

As for the board's non-executive directors, he notes that they "were so wholly dependent on actuarial input from the chief executive/actuary that they were largely incapable of exercising any influence on the actuarial management of the Society".

Furthermore, he finds:

"None of the non-executive members of the Board had relevant skills or experience of actuarial principles or methodologies".

He states:

"the non-executive directors generally had a poor understanding of the Society's developing financial position."

He goes on to describe the board as a

"self-perpetuating oligarchy amenable to policyholder pressure only at its discretion."

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The issue of the role of non-executive directors is not limited only to Equitable Life. We have seen numerous reports on what needs to happen with regard to that role. Are the Government now looking seriously at the matter, not necessarily in terms of legislation or regulation, but to seek to find some arrangement with the City so that we can sort things out once and for all?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Department of Trade and Industry recently discussed in the course of preparing the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill the respective responsibilities that non-executive directors should be expected to have. The Government are actively taking that issue forward.

Lord Penrose describes how the management also failed in its obligations to disclose full information to its own policyholders and to the regulators. He finds that the management of the society fixed on the differential terminal bonus policy as early as 1983, but did not inform policyholders for more than a decade. He says:

"The policy was not disclosed to policyholders by direct communication, in any way, until 1996 . . . Failure to disclose this intention must be regarded as a serious omission in communication to policyholders of relevant information about their prospective interests from at least 1988, and arguably from the time in the early 1980s that management first took that decision."

Even when the company decided to inform policyholders in 1996, it was done badly. Penrose states:

"Attempts were made to change expectations in 1996 and later years. These were ill-conceived, poorly expressed and confusing. The intimations to policyholders were generally uncommunicative."

As for the society's approach to the regulators in that period, Lord Penrose notes that Mr. Ranson, the appointed actuary from 1982, and both chief executive and appointed actuary of the company between 1991 and 1997, was "frequently aggressive" in his dealings with regulators, "dismissive" of regulators' concerns and "obstructive" of scrutiny. The regulatory returns were, Lord Penrose says, "opaque and uncommunicative", and

"failed to identify in value the growing guaranteed obligations that resulted from a combination of falling interest rates and lightening mortality."

Lord Penrose therefore argues that primary responsibility for the society's problems lies with the society and its former management, saying:

"Principally, the Society was the author of its own misfortunes."

Lord Penrose makes it clear that Equitable Life was unique. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), Lord Penrose says:

"The Society's uniqueness lay in the approach adopted by its management, not in the essential characteristics of its business."

That unique management approach led to the fundamental weakening of the society, as its inherited estate was run down and ultimately became negative. Nevertheless, Lord Penrose's verdict on the regulatory system is perfectly clear.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that the managing director, who directed the society, was also the appointed auditor led to a clear conflict of interest that should not have arisen?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right that a conflict of interest arises in that situation. It is precisely to avoid such a conflict of interest that reforms to the Financial Services Authority have been introduced to remove responsibility from the appointed actuary and place it firmly on the board of insurance companies, where it should properly be.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I declare an interest as a former policyholder with Equitable Life. I still have one school fees policy, for the good that it does me.

The Financial Secretary is giving us a précis of the Penrose report, which we can all read for ourselves, but she has not told us what the Government are going to do, having read the report. Will she do so, and if so, at what stage?

Ruth Kelly: I shall tell the House about the way forward very shortly, but I thought it important to expose the contents of Lord Penrose's report to the House, as he makes some profound comments about the operation of the regulatory regime before the FSA was set up.

Lord Penrose's verdict on the regulatory system is perfectly clear, as he says:

"the regulatory system failed policyholders in this case".

However, he adds:

"regulatory system failures were secondary."

He clearly states that it was

"the system that failed to provide the regulation that changing circumstances in the industry required, not that there was failure to implement what was fundamentally a satisfactory system."

He makes no allegation of maladministration or negligence against the regulator or individuals, and says:

"I do not pin the blame on individuals, who in the main have operated in good faith and to the best of their abilities within the system as they found it."

Nor does he suggest that any individual regulatory decision led to economic loss by policyholders. Specifically, he notes that "it is not enough in this case to infer from the coincidence of systems deficiencies and loss that one caused or contributed to the other".

The House should reflect carefully on the lessons that he draws about the nature of the reactive and under-resourced regulatory system in place before 1997 and his key message that the regulatory system must be kept up to date to take account of industry developments. Lord Penrose states:

"It seems not unreasonable to suggest that those in control of any supervisory regime have a duty . . . to take steps to ensure that the systems of regulation that are in force and enforced remain relevant to the changing requirements of the industry."

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): The Financial Secretary is being careful to pin the blame on the regulatory regime before 1997, but is it not the case that in 1998 and 1999, after discussions had taken place in the Treasury and in the FSA about the financial viability of Equitable Life, Equitable Life salesmen were still visiting my constituents and selling them with-profits policies which ultimately caused them substantial loss? How can she therefore claim that all was well after 1997, after the reforms that her Government introduced, when palpably for my constituents that was not the case?

Ruth Kelly: As Lord Penrose himself recognises, it is not possible to introduce a fundamental overhaul of a regulatory regime overnight. If the hon. Gentleman cares to consult the Penrose report he will see that it states that that is on page 722 of the report at paragraph 215. I quote further:

"In day-to-day regulatory practice, officials operated within the constraints imposed by the existing system, and they had no alternative but to do so."

The regulatory regime was in the process of being overhauled.

As Lord Penrose says, the Equitable case argues strongly for a closer merging of

"prudential and conduct of business regulation"

and he says that while setting up the FSA

"the need for greater regulatory resource had been identified for the Treasury."

The House will no doubt be interested in the fact that whereas before 1997 there were 70 supervisors supervising 800 life companies, compared with 400 staff regulating 600 banks, that figure for the regulation of life companies has been doubled by the reforms that the Government introduced. The FSA has not only doubled the resources allocated to life insurance regulation, but significantly upgraded the personnel devoted to that task.

Today I want to concentrate on the way forward, drawing on Lord Penrose's conclusions on the lessons learned from his investigation. We are continuing the process of regulatory reform that we began in 1997, pushing forward in particular the specific changes in the life insurance sector that the FSA has in train. In addition, we are acting on Lord Penrose's suggestions for change in the areas of accounting standards, corporate governance of mutuals and the actuarial profession. Lord Penrose welcomes the FSA's regulatory reform, which, he says,

"has sought to anticipate many of the lessons that might be drawn by this enquiry and it should come as no surprise that it has largely succeeded."

Let me remind the House what has been achieved in this area over the past six years. On 20 May 1997, the Government announced major changes to the structure of financial services regulation in the United Kingdom. Those were implemented by means of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, which created a new framework for the regulation of financial services, providing clarity, fair competition and protection for consumers. The Act established the Financial Services Authority as the single regulator for the financial services industry, operating under a single coherent legislative framework, replacing nine different sectoral regulators. It also introduced a single ombudsman scheme to resolve consumer complaints and a single financial services compensation scheme. The major reforms that the FSA has since launched are in many cases changes that have been possible only because of the move to a fully integrated regulator combining prudential and conduct of business regulation.

The main changes that the FSA has already introduced—apart from increasing the resource devoted to life insurance regulation—are first, moving to a single risk model to determine the allocation of the FSA's own resources, and secondly, breaking down the barriers between different types and areas of supervision. The largest companies are now supervised, whatever their principal line of business, on a group basis, so the major insurance groups are now handled by the FSA's major financial groups division, rather than by its insurance division.

Moreover, the FSA has proposed significant changes to the role of the appointed actuary, some of which I have already outlined to the House. The FSA is also introducing, from this year and next, realistic reporting by life offices. The requirement to report assets and liabilities on a realistic basis includes a requirement to provide for accrued terminal bonus. Lord Penrose welcomes those proposals as "clear recognition of the importance of looking beyond a narrow concept of solvency".

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): That is all well and good, but my constituents want to know what the Government will do to give them the compensation that they both want and need. Lord Penrose said to the Treasury Committee that he did not consider it in his remit to discuss administration and compensation; he considers that to be the Government's remit. When will the Government come forward and offer the victims of Equitable Life some hope?

Ruth Kelly: Lord Penrose definitely did not say in his evidence to the Treasury Committee that that was the Government's responsibility. He was clear that he accepted the conclusion that this was regulatory system failure, not operational failure. But as I outlined to the House, and have been outlining to the House, we have set up a structure in which consumers have recourse, if they believe that they have an individual grievance, to the financial ombudsman service.

Let me make it clear to the House that the issue that has been identified by Lord Penrose is not a simple one. It is an extremely complex legal and actuarial issue—about £3 billion of bonuses being paid out more than the company could afford over a period of 10 years or even longer. Lord Penrose says that his estimate is "crude", but he also says that the amount and whether this would lead to claims could be determined only by the courts. He is absolutely clear in his report on that point.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend recall that when Lord Penrose gave evidence to the Treasury Committee a few days ago, he said that in order to prove blame it was essential to demonstrate breach of duty, and that that in his view was clearly the business of the courts?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes an extremely valuable point.

Mr. Garnier: How does the Financial Secretary expect the damaged policyholders of Equitable Life to afford to get to the court?

Ruth Kelly: The first point to make is that Lord Penrose considers this to be such a complex issue that it can be determined only by the court. He is absolutely clear on that point. I have described the structure set up, which includes the financial ombudsman service to adjudicate on individual policyholder complaints, and if people feel that they have an individual grievance, they could take advantage of the structure that we have set up to present their claim. It would then be up to the financial ombudsman to decide whether it was an issue that he could consider, or whether it would be better determined directly by a court of law.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I realise that the Financial Secretary may not wish to comment on the solvency of Equitable Life at the moment. It says that it is solvent, but if all the policyholders follow the route that she suggests through the ombudsman, she must surely address the question, which is very real, that Equitable Life may not remain solvent if it has to meet all those demands. What is her assessment of the impact that that will have not just on Equitable Life, but on all the other life companies that may well have to contribute to the fund that will be needed to pay out?

Ruth Kelly: Equitable Life—it is an important point—has made it clear that it disputes entirely the analysis and the factual basis of the content presented by Lord Penrose on the over-allocation of bonuses throughout this period. It is an extremely complex legal and actuarial issue, upon which different actuaries will undoubtedly have different views. Equitable Life is clear that it is currently solvent and the FSA has no basis on which to override that view.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): Will the Financial Secretary address herself to the issue of how this matter will get to the court? Who will be able to afford to take a case to the courts?

Ruth Kelly: Clearly, it is up to individuals and categories of individuals to decide what they want to do on the basis of the analysis presented by Lord Penrose. As I have said, there are different interpretations both about the facts and the interpretation of those facts leading to his analysis that £3 billion of over-bonusing took place within that time scale. He says that the issue is so difficult that only the courts can determine it, but policyholders must decide on the basis of advice what is in their best interests.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): The paradox of the situation is that the policyholders would be better off if the society became insolvent, in which case, as I understand it, the Government would have to pay them 90 per cent. of their promised benefits. Is that not the case?

Ruth Kelly: I was about to come on to the proposals set down by the Financial Services Authority, which are currently out for consultation, to ensure better treatment of customers by firms. The hon. Gentleman makes a point about what is currently in the best interests of customers, and the society is absolutely clear that its continuing in business is in the best interests of current policyholders. As I have said, the society is confident that it is solvent.

From next month, firms must also publish a statement of their principles and practice in financial management, setting out how they manage their with-profits funds.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, because many people are concerned about the matter. Is it not the case that what she now says—that the company is solvent and that, as the regulator, the FSA is happy with it—means that she does not think that anybody has a legitimate claim against the company, and that she does not think that anything wrong has happened, because the Government are still not taking regulatory action?

Ruth Kelly: I have said nothing of the sort. I have set out the facts as presented by Lord Penrose, who says that his estimates are necessarily "crude". Lord Penrose has also said that the issue could be determined only by a court of law. I do not want to pre-empt a judgment by a court of law or, indeed, any judgment made in another setting.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): The Minister says that the policyholders who have been hit should consider going to court. Let us suppose that they go to court and win: who would pay the bill and where would the money come from? In that case, the money would come straight from Equitable Life, so, in other words, it would be robbing Peter to pay Paul. Is she not, therefore, holding out false hopes to hundreds of thousands of policyholders?

Ruth Kelly: I am not holding out false hopes; I am not saying anything of the kind—I am presenting the situation as Lord Penrose found it.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Before the Minister develops her points about the need for litigation, is she aware that all the policy makers who were members of the with-profits scheme in February 2002—in other words, the people who ratified the scheme—were required to sign away their right to go to court or the financial ombudsman? None of those members has any possibility of pursuing legal action.

Ruth Kelly: Although I do not like to get involved in legal matters—as the hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware—there are various legal interpretations of that point.

I am confident that the root-and-branch reform of insurance regulation that I have described will result in the industry becoming more transparent and accountable, and with the financial resources to meet fully the reasonable expectations of its policyholders. I am also confident that the introduction of the stakeholder suite of more simple and transparent saving and investment products, which the Treasury is currently developing in conjunction with the FSA, will provide the life industry with products that are attractive to consumers and that will also help to improve the transparency and accountability of the industry.

The reform of the regulatory system has been strongly endorsed by Lord Penrose, who said:

"If the proposals in hand for the future of the new regulatory system are implemented, and if they are made effective in practice . . . the major criticisms of the earlier regulatory regime will have been addressed".

Speaking of the FSA's response to the lessons learned from Equitable Life, Lord Penrose said in his recent evidence to the Treasury Committee:

"my clear impression is that the approach now being adopted is a very considerable improvement on what there was before".

Looking ahead, Lord Penrose points to the need to reform accounting standards for the life assurance sector, and states:

"The fundamental problem with the statutory accounts of any life office is that the accounting professions have failed to develop acceptable accounting standards for the preparation and presentation of accounts of long-term business that require realistic accounting on a consistent basis . . . what is required are practical standards of general application."

As I announced on 8 March, I have asked the Accounting Standards Board to carry out an urgent study of accounting for with-profits business within the accounts of life insurance companies. The study will address the accounting framework for with-profits business, including provision for disclosure of terminal bonus. The study is particularly timely, as it will enable an assessment to be made of with-profits accounting against the background of recent developments in realistic accounting within the FSA regulatory regime.

Although, as Lord Penrose pointed out, the problems at Equitable Life arose as a result of particular circumstances in place during the inquiry period, the report raises important questions for the governance of mutual life offices in general. The Government see no reason in principle why boards of mutual life offices should not be as accountable to their members as those of comparable companies are to their shareholders. On 8 March, I announced that I have asked Paul Myners to lead a review into the corporate governance arrangements applicable to mutual life offices. The review's terms of reference are to:

"Consider the governance framework for mutual life offices in comparison with that for comparable companies (and, where relevant, for listed companies). Where appropriate, bring forward recommendations to ensure that boards of mutual life offices are as accountable to their members as boards of comparable companies are to their shareholders."

Mr. Love: I welcome the Myners review. My hon. Friend will be aware that the articles of Equitable reflected company law in that 10 per cent. of the members were needed to requisition special business, but that was an impossible task because its membership was so large. Its memorandum and articles meant that it had a self-selecting board of directors. Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to ensure that policyholders are protected and that they are consulted before actions are taken in the society?

Ruth Kelly: Although I do not want to prejudge the results of Paul Myners's inquiry into the accountability of mutual life offices, my hon. Friend draws attention to a particularly important point. We need to ensure that mutual life offices are as accountable to their policyholders as possible.

The review will consult as widely as possible, taking into account the recent experience of other mutuals in this respect in developing its conclusions and recommendations. As the governance of mutual life offices has much in common with that of other mutual societies, the review may, where appropriate, develop general governance principles for other types of mutual, taking into account the particular characteristics of other parts of the mutual sector. The review will deliver a report, with recommendations, by the end of 2004.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Ruth Kelly: I must continue with my speech.

Actuaries play a vital role in the financial services industry and, as a profession, have placed admirable emphasis on high standards of technical ability, knowledge and integrity. However, Lord Penrose makes it clear in his report that it is not enough to rely on that. He makes a number of general criticisms of the actuarial profession, drawing on his findings in relation to Equitable Life. Clearly, a modern professional or regulatory framework is necessary. As I announced on 8 March, Sir Derek Morris will lead a wide-ranging review of the actuarial profession. It will start on 1 May, following his retirement from the Competition Commission. The review's terms of reference are:

"Consider what professional and/or other regulatory framework would best promote recognised, high-quality and continuously developing actuarial standards, openness in the application of actuarial skills, transparency in the professional conduct of actuaries, accountability for their actions and an open and competitive market for actuarial advice in the UK."

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Ruth Kelly: On the subject of actuaries, I give way for the last time.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: One of the items that Penrose identified was the obstructive nature of the actuary at Equitable Life. He also identified the paucity of function of the non-executive directors and the problems involving the auditor. Clearly, there were service failures by the regulator in relation to Equitable Life. Have the Government considered whether, instead of a protracted court procedure, it might be better to have a one-off payment for affected policyholders on the basis that the regulator would not be held liable?

Ruth Kelly: I do not think that those were the conclusions drawn by Lord Penrose's report. He is absolutely clear that this is not a question of individual regulatory failure, but of regulatory system failure and the policy that prevailed. The House should reflect carefully on what Lord Penrose has written in that regard.

Lord Penrose's report provides a full and detailed account of the developments at Equitable Life over a long period. In doing so, it has provided us with a clear explanation of how the society got itself into financial difficulties, and clear pointers to the way forward. One of the key lessons that he draws from his work, with the benefit of hindsight, is that the regulatory system in place before 1997 was inadequate and unable to keep pace with changes in the financial services industry. Since 1997, this Government have radically overhauled the regulatory system that we inherited. We will ensure that that system remains fit for the purpose.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I do not think that the many hundreds of thousands of people who have been adversely affected by this saga will take much comfort from what we have just heard. I shall begin by declaring an interest, as the member of a family that is among those affected. I intend to pursue this issue over the coming months and, for the avoidance of doubt, if at any time, now or under a future Government, any compensation becomes payable to my family, it will go to charity.

I have to enter a note of surprise and regret that the Chancellor is not here this evening. It is a pity that he has not chosen to speak in this debate, and that he is not here to listen to it. It is also a pity that he has not taken any part in the proceedings, and that he has never been willing to have anything to do with the subject. The people who have suffered from these events will take their own note of that.

Mr. Plaskitt: While we are on that point, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us why he was not here to reply to the statement on this matter?

Mr. Letwin: I was here throughout those events, after about the first three minutes. I have chosen to reply to the Minister today precisely to indicate that we treat this matter with the greatest possible seriousness, although all my hon. Friends on the Front Bench are more than capable of answering the Minister. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) will be winding up. The Treasury Bench appears to have only one Minister interested in the subject; I believe that she will also be winding up. That is a disgraceful state of affairs, on which the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) should reflect. [Interruption.] The Chief Secretary should not rumble from a sedentary position, as he was yesterday being remote controlled by the Chancellor, although not very effectively.

The Minister has made an argument, of which I take note, and I shall recapitulate it briefly. Putting together what she said today with what she said in her statement, we see that the shape of that argument is perfectly clear. She argued that this failure happened primarily because of management, and that regulatory failure was therefore only a secondary cause. She then argued that all such regulatory failure was pre-1997, and that it was entirely due to a light-touch regime rather than to any operational failure. She argued that there was therefore no need for Lord Penrose, the ombudsman or anyone else other than the courts to look at the question of maladministration, and that there was therefore no need for anyone other than the courts to investigate whether anyone was owed compensation.

As the courts will only award compensation against other policyholders and—as a fascinating earlier exchange revealed—people will probably need a lawyer to discover whether they can go to court in the first place, there is very little chance of their obtaining any compensation. The Minister has repeatedly argued in her statement and in public that all of that is utterly different from Barlow Clowes because there is now a compensation scheme. That is the Financial Secretary's argument, although it did not take me 40 minutes to put it to the House. That is all that she has ever said.

Let us go through that argument step by step. Is it true that the Penrose report reveals that the primary cause of the failure was management? Yes. I hope that the Financial Secretary will take comfort from that; it is the one part of her argument that is perfectly accurate. Secondly, is it true that the Penrose report concludes that the regulatory failure was only secondary? No, it is not. The Penrose report indeed indicates that it was secondary, but what does it mean by secondary? It is very clear: had the management not mis-performed and had the society been in good shape, the existence of a regulatory problem would not have been a difficulty for policyholders. We accept this, of course.

If a fragile piece of glass is not broken, the fact of its fragility is not a problem, but in this case the glass was broken and fragile. The reason, in part, for that fragility was regulatory failure. The regulatory failure was a necessary—[HON. MEMBERS: "System failure."] I shall come to the system question in a moment. I hope that Labour Members hold their fire, because they are about to hear what Lord Penrose has to say about that. Regulatory failure in this case contributed to the problem and it was a necessary cause of the problem. Had regulation been perfect—had it even been good—in Lord Penrose's view the outcome might have been different.

Lord Penrose does not—in this, the Financial Secretary is quite right—say how much regulatory failure contributed to the appalling problems that arose or how responsible those problems are. He goes on to explain that that is because he was precluded from making those judgments. That is very different from him having concluded that it was not of importance; he was precluded from considering that question.

Next, is it true—this is the most dull and tedious of all the Financial Secretary's arguments—that all the failure was pre-1997? No, that is not what Lord Penrose says. In relation to 1998, he says

"GAD's approach over this period seems to me to have been persistently naïve".

In relation to 2000, he says that in

"the specific circumstances of the Society at the time one might reasonably have expected that more would have been done to test the assumption that the profits would emerge."

Again in relation to 2000, he says that

"the FSA and GAD were incapable of making an independent assessment of the Society's prospects of sale because of their lack of knowledge and understanding of the totality of the Society's business."

Finally, in relation to January to July 2000, he says that

"little was done by the FSA in relation to the court case between the Court of Appeal judgment in January and whispers of the possible outcome in June and July of the House of Lords' hearings."

Those are all events post-1997. Do I therefore conclude that this Government are the object of criticism? No, because unlike the Financial Secretary I have no interest here in playing politics. Do I conclude that pre-1997 there were no failures? I do not. I accept that there were failures before 1997. This is a failure of British government and a failure, regrettably, of government under two separate Administrations. On this, the only clean hands in the House, alas, belong to those who sit on the Liberal Democrat Benches, because they have not been in government. Very likely, had they been in government, they also would have been responsible for this failure, but I have to admit that they did not get the chance to be responsible.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise that Lord Penrose speaks of a system failure, not a failure of the operators, and that the system was put in place by the Government he supported and was supported by the majority in Parliament, who were Members from his party? That shows the barrenness of the philosophy of light-touch regulation, which did no service to the Equitable policyholders or to the financial services industry generally.

Mr. Letwin: In a moment or two, the hon. Gentleman will regret those remarks. Let me deal with both in turn, because they indeed relate to the next point in the Financial Secretary's argument, and both are false.

I will read the hon. Gentleman some passages from the report—there are many—that indicate that Lord Penrose, in clear and absolute contradiction to the Financial Secretary, repeatedly points to operational failures as opposed merely to system failures, though he indeed believes that there were also system failures for which our Government were partly responsible. I am not playing politics; I am telling the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues what is in the report, rather than inventing a further version of it.

[Mr. Letwin]

At paragraph 240 in chapter 19, Lord Penrose tell us:

"There was a general failure on the part of the regulators and GAD".

At paragraph 158 in chapter 19, he describes the Department of Trade and Industry, the Treasury and the Government Actuary's Department as "complacent".

In paragraph 171 of the same chapter, he describes the failure of the regulator "to appreciate that a change of valuation assumptions had real implications".

In paragraph 187, he describes

"short-term objectives related to support of solvency that should have alerted regulators to the Society's weakening position".

In paragraph 209, he tells us that

"information was not used to form a realistic appraisal of the society's financial position".

In paragraph 228, he tells us that

"unsatisfactory answers were accepted without follow up".

The hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), whom I have encountered on various occasions in the House, is intelligent and honest enough to recognise that those are operational failures. They occurred partially under our regime, and partially under the regime of the Financial Secretary and her colleagues. They were operational failures, however, not ministerial failures, and not parliamentary failures.

Mr. Redwood: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the Financial Secretary contradicted herself, because she said that this was a system failure by regulators? She then said that Equitable Life was unique—it was the only one that went wrong, it was the only problem child. It is beyond belief that there could be a serious system failure of regulation, over a period of 10 years or more, and only one casualty. Surely it must be the case that the main regulatory failure was specific regulation failure of that company.

Mr. Letwin: My right hon. Friend, as always, makes an extremely powerful point. Another fascinating point emerged today for the first time, I think. The Financial Secretary lauded the Government for having improved the personnel who were regulating. Why would it be necessary to improve the personnel who were regulating if there were no failures on the part of the personnel who were previously regulating? Those are obviously operational failures—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington chunters from a sedentary position about system failure. According to the Financial Secretary's statement, if personnel were implicitly not up to the job, that indicates that they were doing something wrong at the operational level.

Ruth Kelly: The right hon. Gentleman is making a very interesting argument about operational failure. In the context of his remarks, however, can he explain to the House this quote—I do not paraphrase—from Lord Penrose, who says it was,

"the system that failed to provide the regulation that changing circumstances in the industry required, not that there was failure to implement what was fundamentally a satisfactory system"?

Mr. Letwin: The problem with the Financial Secretary's argument is that because she is playing party politics, she refuses to acknowledge what is clear, and what I have acknowledged: there were system failures. Were I denying that there was a system failure, she would have something to say. But I have not denied it. There was system failure, and operational failure, and I have just listed six cases in which Lord Penrose points specifically to operational failure.

Mr. Plaskitt: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I am going to answer the other part of the point made by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford, if I may. The next thing that he said was that it was all light-handed regulation that was at fault, which the Financial Secretary has said on repeated occasions. The fact that it was light-handed may have partially been at fault. It is therefore of great interest that the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn)—not a Conservative Member, and not a Minister in our regime, but a Minister at the time in the Financial Secretary's Government—said about the nature of the regulatory regime on 28 June 1999, at column 39:

"There will be a light touch where possible . . . The Bill avoids over-burdensome regulation that would serve only to stifle innovation and to increase consumer costs. Instead . . . the FSA will be under a duty to demonstrate that the burdens that it seeks to impose are proportionate to the benefits that will result."—[Official Report, 28 June 1999; Vol. 334, c. 39.]

It does not therefore pay to insult the many hundreds of thousands of people involved by engaging in the petty party politics of claiming that light-handed regulation, which may have been partly to blame, and system failure, which was certainly partly to blame, is exclusively the problem of one Government or the other.

Mr. Beard rose—

Mr. Letwin: The truth is that there was system failure, which occurred under both Governments, and there were operational failures, which occurred under both Governments. That is the conclusion to which any ordinary person reading the Penrose report would come.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman want the Government to compensate Equitable Life policyholders? Is that his party's policy, and what does he think it would cost?

Mr. Letwin: That is the point I was coming to—the question of maladministration. As I have said, the Financial Secretary's assertion is that because, as she wrongly asserts, there was no operational failure and because, as she wrongly asserts, it was all a long time ago, there is, in her wrong estimation, no reason for an investigation into whether there was maladministration, and hence no need for anyone to ascertain whether compensation is payable. Our view is that there should be such an investigation, that there needs to be such an investigation, that Lord Penrose did not conduct such an investigation because the remit under which he was operating specifically precluded him from doing so, and that it is therefore appropriate for the parliamentary ombudsman's remit to be extended to include the Government Actuary's Department so that she can conduct a proper investigation and identify whether there was maladministration, or for the Government to ask Lord Penrose to extend his remit to engaging in an investigation, or for the Government to find another suitable means of conducting it.

This is the Financial Secretary's position. She does not know whether there was maladministration, because she did not ask Lord Penrose to find out so he did not feel enabled to tell her, and she does not want to know whether there was maladministration because she does not want to know whether following maladministration there would be compensation. The reason she has been put up to present the specious argument that she has presented is that the Chancellor does not want to find out whether compensation would be payable.

Ruth Kelly: How does the right hon. Gentleman react to a statement made by Lord Penrose to the Treasury Committee only last week? He said

"I do not identify any respect in which I recognise limits on what I was able to do."

Mr. Letwin: What is odd is that in the report Lord Penrose makes it perfectly clear that he had not the remit to investigate maladministration.

Ruth Kelly: What about the courts?

Mr. Letwin: We will return to the courts in a moment. As the Financial Secretary well knows, the courts are not an answer.

Let us test the Financial Secretary's bona fides in a perfectly straightforward way. If it is the case that Lord Penrose was perfectly able to investigate maladministration and if the Financial Secretary has nothing to fear from an investigation of maladministration, will she now—by making a small change in a statutory instrument—allow the parliamentary ombudsman to investigate maladministration?

Ruth Kelly: It cannot be done.

Mr. Letwin: Ah! The Financial Secretary says, from a sedentary position, that it cannot be done. We will provide the Financial Secretary with the means of doing it in the House, and see whether she accedes to that. The fact is that the Financial Secretary and her colleagues do not want an investigation of maladministration, and I think that that is a disgrace.

Mr. Garnier: The Library briefing paper on the matter reports

"The Inquiry board did not have as part of its remit the responsibility of making recommendations about compensation, indeed the remit is quite narrowly restricted to, as Ruth Kelly's letter made clear:

'identify any lessons to be learned for the conduct, administration and regulation of life assurance business; and to give a report thereon to Treasury Ministers'."

The Financial Secretary's letter was written to thank Lord Penrose for taking on the job of holding the inquiry.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend, who with his normal forensic ability has pointed to the relevant evidence.

Finally, let us turn to the question of compensation and Barlow Clowes. This is one of the most extraordinary features of the Financial Secretary's argument. In fact, it is so extraordinary that as far as I could make out, although she spoke for a long time, she did not include it today. She included it in her original statement, however, and she has been making it in broadcasts repeatedly. It is the argument that somehow we need not worry about whether there is maladministration and we need not have an investigation into whether compensation is due as a result of maladministration, because there is a compensation scheme now in existence. Well, there is a compensation scheme now in existence, and it relates to insolvency.

The effect of compensation following insolvency is to restore people to the position that is absolutely guaranteed to them, which is a great way below what people have a reasonable expectation of otherwise receiving. The Financial Secretary knows that very well, and she therefore knows that unless horrors strike the society, the existence of the compensation scheme is a complete irrelevance to the many people whose reasonable expectations have not been fulfilled. That, I fear, is another disgraceful aspect of the Government's position.

Mr. Forth: Is it not the case that if policyholders followed the Financial Secretary's advice, they would end up, in effect, suing themselves?

Mr. Letwin: Suing themselves or suing one another, which is not fair, right, just or decent. If there was regulatory failure—and there was, because Lord Penrose shows it—and if there was operational failure, which Lord Penrose also shows, and if those occurred through two Administrations, as they did, it is reasonable that there should be a proper investigation of maladministration.

Mr. Beard rose—

Mr. Letwin: I shall not give way because I am just concluding.

It is reasonable and possible to have a proper investigation into maladministration, and such an investigation would establish whether there were or were not grounds for compensation because it would establish the extent to which the maladministration caused the defect for policyholders. The Financial Secretary cannot reasonably debar that further investigation, and I hope that in some months' time, with whatever kicking and screaming, she will accede to that request.

7 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I express my appreciation for having the opportunity to speak on this subject on a somewhat more level playing field than we had at the time of the Minister's statement—she had then had 11 weeks to peruse the report, whereas we had had a couple of hours. I should like to say at the outset that I identify myself with the Conservative shadow Chancellor's comments on the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This is an important issue, and he should be here. That is no reflection on the Financial Secretary, who is an able Minister who clearly understands the subject and debates the points well, but my point is that the Chancellor should be here.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

The Chancellor has shown a selective interest in issues of financial regulation. I recall responding to a statement that he made on Sandler products, which was not exactly at the front rank of public controversy on financial regulation, and when in opposition, he took a close interest in matters of financial regulation in relation to the BCCI and Barlow Clowes. His absence today suggests one of two things: he is very embarrassed, or he is not interested. Either of those reasons is unacceptable.

Before we plunge further into the technicalities of Penrose, it is important to reinforce the basic message that we are talking about human beings who have suffered much distress and loss, many of whom are perfectly ordinary constituents. It works out on average that we all have about 1,500 affected constituents, many of whom were not sophisticated investors or they would not have been in Equitable Life in the first place. Equitable Life's reputation as a secure, reliable fund was what drew many people to it who wanted a source of security.

The Penrose report raises two fundamental issues, and the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) dealt with one of them at length, very clearly and correctly. That is the distinction between the failure of the regulatory system and the operational failure of regulation. It is abundantly clear on any reading of the report—it was clear when the report was first published—that both are involved. We could debate endlessly whether their relative involvement was 50:50 or 75:25, but both were clearly involved. In the penultimate paragraph of the report, in which Lord Penrose brings his thoughts to a conclusion, he brings both those concepts together, making the point in one paragraph with admirable clarity. It says, and this was the point that the Financial Secretary made:

"As for the regulatory system, I do believe that it has failed policyholders in this case."

The system failed—Lord Penrose is absolutely right. However, he then goes on to make a point that clearly has weight in his mind, because these are almost the last words in the report:

"But I do take the view that the system itself was not overseen, and in particular was not kept up-to-date, and operated in an ineffective manner."

The system operated ineffectively—there was operational failure. The word is the same.

The second key insight of Penrose, to which the right hon. Member for West Dorset did not refer, but which needs to be stressed, was that the main failure was not the failure created by guaranteed annuities in the House of Lords, although many of us had assumed all along that that was the ultimate source of the problem. The problem that Penrose and some action groups identified was that of prolonged large-scale over-bonusing. In effect, there was a pyramid selling scheme. I am not an expert in finance, but those who are tell me that there is a technical phrase for it: a Ponzi pyramid selling scheme. In terms of the broader argument, the significance of that is that one can argue that it was just about understandable that the management—and certainly the regulators—did not guess correctly which way the House of Lords would jump in a highly contentious ruling. In fact, Penrose does not argue that case, but he could have. However, it was completely unforgivable and unacceptable for the management and those who were supposed to be overseeing and regulating the scheme to administer what was a pyramid selling scheme for 10 years.

To reinforce the point that has already been made, the report is replete with references to operational failure. I need not read it in detail; rather, I shall pick out a few key summary passages, some specific and others general. I shall read verbatim one key conclusion from the final chapter, because it captures its spirit:

"There was a general failure on the part of the regulators and the GAD to follow up issues that arose in the course of their regulation of the Society, and to mount an effective challenge of the management."

How can that possibly be interpreted in any way other than as concluding that there was an operational failure? It is an explicit and completely unqualified conclusion.

There are numerous instances of the Penrose report's picking up on particular operational failures on the part of the regulators. For example, it refers to the regulators failing to pick up on the company's admission that it was not reserving for its guarantees. It refers to

"a serious lapse in regulation . . . Any reasonably diligent inquiry would have elicited" the necessary information. The report proceeds to discuss the episode following the period in which the regulators had been alerted to the existence of the annuities guarantee. It says that they knew about the problem in 1993, and states that

"the approach of the GAD and regulators remained the same", even

"when they were aware that the Society's financial position was weak and that there was a need for vigilance in scrutiny and supervision."

This is all about operational matters and the way in which regulation was conducted; it is not about the system.

Mr. Plaskitt: The report does indeed make these individual observations, but what does the hon. Gentleman makes of Lord Penrose's statement in paragraph 29 of chapter 20? He stands back and sums it all up as follows:

"The thrust of my criticism is that . . . it was the system that failed to provide the regulation the changing circumstances in the industry required."

Dr. Cable: I am not disputing that. Both the Conservative spokesman and I fully acknowledged at the outset that the system clearly failed, but it is also true that there were many incidents of very specific, as well as general, negligence. The issue is the importance of that in the overall scheme of things. We shall come later to the question, which has already been raised, of who is to decide whether that in its totality amounts to maladministration, because we have yet to reach that point.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to make that point, and in that regard I was astonished by the Financial Secretary's intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). The hon. Gentleman will be aware that Lord Penrose says the following in the postscript to his report:

"Many readers of this report will be frustrated that it has not provided answers to two questions: who is at fault for the problems encountered by the Society, and who deserves redress as a consequence. It has been no part of this inquiry to attempt to answer either question."

Surely that alone puts a stamp of endorsement on the request from all sides for the ombudsman to look at this issue.

Dr. Cable: Yes, although I am not sure that the ombudsman constitutes the right mechanism, the logic of what the hon. Gentleman says is right.

Certain issues relating to regulatory failure were not even covered in the Penrose report because there was so much material around. One such issue was drawn to my attention by a consultancy company called Thesys, which attempted to brief Lord Penrose but did not succeed. It made the point that a series of insurance laws and regulations were issued in 1958, 1973 and 1983, as a result of which "schedule 5" provisions were established. Those provisions were an arrangement whereby the Department of Trade and Industry collected data with the specific purpose of enabling independent assessments of whether insurance companies were actuarially sound.

In the early 1990s, the schedule 5 forms stopped being filled in. The regulators decided that it was inconvenient or too onerous to collect that information. If one wanted to be party political about it, one could say that Lord Heseltine was the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at the time and so was somehow responsible for what happened. Indirectly, I suppose that he was. Clearly, however, an operational decision was taken to stop collecting data that were crucial to identifying the failures that subsequently emerged. It was essentially an operational failure—one that even Lord Penrose has not detected.

We then come on to the question of maladministration—what it means, and its significance. I have been careful—I note that the right hon. Member for West Dorset was also careful—to make it clear that we are not asking the Government to get out their cheque books and sign blank cheques to large numbers of people because of their losses. That would be inappropriate, because we first need to establish whether maladministration has taken place. I do not yet know whether it did; the report did not reach a conclusion on that.

Mr. Gardiner: I am trying to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully. Would he not have to show not only that there had been maladministration, but that that maladministration had been relevant to the failure? It is not enough to say that there were operational errors in which those applying the regulations failed to apply them properly. It is necessary to show that they failed to apply relevant regulations in such a way as to precipitate the position with which we now have to deal.

Dr. Cable: I would not dispute that perfectly sensible point. That would be the purpose of the next stage of the inquiry—to establish whether the maladministration was indeed relevant and central to the failure or otherwise. I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's valid point.

We must be absolutely clear—the Financial Secretary was not—about Lord Penrose's assessment of his own role. At the end of the report, Lord Penrose clearly states:

"The jurisdiction to adjudicate on regulatory failure in duty is not mine."

He makes it absolutely clear that that was not his job. He has not exonerated the government—I mean with a little "g"—of maladministration; he did not reach a decision on it.

There are different ways of following the report through. The normal procedure would be to go to the parliamentary ombudsman, which is what the right hon. Member for West Dorset suggested. That is what has happened in the past, but there are some practical reasons for not doing that. It would certainly take up much of the parliamentary ombudsman's time: the Barlow Clowes case took more than a year, and as the Chancellor said at the time, it took a year to establish what was already known. The ombudsman has already looked into this problem, but not with great success—indeed, many of the key points were subsequently contradicted by Penrose. I believe that there is a simpler way of dealing with it.

Mr. Beard: Has not the parliamentary ombudsman said that she could find no instances of maladministration? That is why she found as she did. Surely that demolishes the elaborate case that the hon. Gentleman is attempting to build up.

Dr. Cable: As I recall it, the parliamentary ombudsman was examining the period covered by the Baird report with respect to the role of the Financial Services Authority. Most of the maladministration seems to have occurred in the early and mid-1990s. That is the period that someone would have to investigate. If it were not to be the parliamentary ombudsman, who would it be?

My suggestion is simple and practical. The Chancellor or the Financial Secretary could simply write to Lord Penrose, asking him—because he was immersed in the subject—to provide a judgment on whether or not maladministration took place. He could be asked to respond within three months. If the Financial Secretary is right, I suspect that he would reply, "I don't need three months. I don't need to spend my time and your money because I don't believe there is any maladministration." Why cannot the Financial Secretary take that small additional step to clarify and prove her point?

Ruth Kelly: If the hon. Gentleman had spent more time on the concluding chapters of the report, he would have seen that Lord Penrose said:

"An open adversarial process such as would have been necessary to replicate the litigation process over the longer period and the wider range of issues would have been beyond contemplation."

[Ruth Kelly]

He also said that, if he had gone down the route that the hon. Gentleman suggests, he could not have concluded his inquiries within a time scale that had regard to the public interest.

Dr. Cable: It is difficult to understand why Lord Penrose would have been constrained, as all the information is in the public domain and is set out at great length in the report. That is the raw material that would have been available to the parliamentary ombudsman, who also would not have been able to call on further information.

Mr. Garnier: Is the hon. Gentleman not puzzled by the Financial Secretary's intervention? She has suggested that people should take their disputes to court, but would not that mean that she was multiplying—in spades—the adversarial nature of any inquiry that a court would engage in, not to mention the costs involved?

Dr. Cable: The hon. and learned Gentleman is right, and I asked about the court in an earlier intervention. The Financial Secretary replied that that was a complicated legal argument that she did not wish to get into. The legal argument may be complicated, but Equitable Life has sent out a very large number of letters on this matter. I shall read an extract from a letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton). The extract covers Equitable Life's response to the proposal that the matters be taken to the court and to the financial ombudsman.

I suspect that the Minister is not entirely familiar with the idea that the financial ombudsman is a mediator who cannot mediate unless both sides are willing. The letter makes very clear the view of Equitable Life about litigation and the financial ombudsman. In respect of legal action, it states:

"The issue you raise was . . . dealt with under the Scheme of Arrangement, also known as the Compromise Scheme, which applies to all with-profits policyholders with policies in force on 8 February 2002. Following approval of the Scheme by the members and the Court, certain rights were given up in exchange for an uplift in policy values. As a result, your claim cannot be upheld.

Also included in the Scheme was the removal of your rights to pursue such complaints by legal or other means, including the Courts and the Financial Ombudsman Service."

From the outset, Equitable Life denied that it would be willing to engage in any form of mediation through the financial ombudsman service. It made it clear that it had already covered itself in respect of action through the courts. The invocation of the courts is therefore a completely false trail, which would cost many people large amounts of money to no effect at all.

Another issue in relation to compensation needs to be clarified.

Mr. Gardiner: If it is a completely false trial, why does the hon. Gentleman think that Lord Penrose commented on it in his report?

Dr. Cable: The report's conclusion is unsatisfactory in that respect. Lord Penrose does not suggest that he was aware of what Equitable Life had said about the limits of litigation but, if the hon. Gentleman knows the reference, I should be happy to take it.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know the reference, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that Lord Penrose was not aware of the arrangement made between policyholders and Equitable Life about giving up their legal rights.

Dr. Cable: I do not know whether he was aware of that or not, but he seems to have urged a course of action that the overwhelming majority of policy holders would not be able to pursue in any circumstances. To that extent, the recommendation—if that is what it was—was not terribly helpful.

The issue of the money is also important. If a compensation claim were to be made, through the courts or, in some other way, through the ombudsman, a basic question must be answered. How much have the policyholders lost—a lot, or a little? Penrose was clear that the loss had been substantial. He said:

"However, whatever the position on compensation might prove to be in the end of the day, it is clear that many Equitable policyholders have suffered much worry and distress, and many . . . will continue to experience real financial hardship".

How great is that real financial hardship? I tabled a question to the Financial Secretary some weeks ago to see whether she could put in the public domain some estimate of the costs. It is clear how they could be calculated. One would look at particular groups of policyholders on the basis of all the evidence that is now available, taking into account the different maturities and types of policy, and compare them with the average. I know that the Financial Secretary was happy, in principle, to put that information into the public domain.

I have now been told that the information cannot be disclosed for reasons of commercial confidentiality invoked by Equitable Life. I was sufficiently concerned by that conclusion to ring the chief executive this lunchtime and ask him why the information could not be made available. I was told that it would be too difficult to provide it. However, it was not too difficult in the golden days when Equitable Life was outperforming the rest of the industry.

The company is no longer willing to disclose the information, which leaves two worrying conclusions. It might be that there were no serious losses, which is possible but implausible. Certainly Lord Penrose did not think that. The alternative is that the current management is so embarrassed by its performance that it is not willing to release the information. However, that information is crucial to the policyholders in making their case, whether for a further inquiry by Penrose or the ombudsman, in the courts or by some other means. That is a serious dereliction of duty by the company now, let alone in the past.

Chris Grayling: I agree that it is a dereliction of duty by the company. Moreover, an organisation that is no longer open for new business, and is therefore not trading in the conventional way that other companies and organisations in the sector are trading, should not use commercial confidentiality as a defence, because it does not apply as it would to any other organisation competing in the financial services industry.

Dr. Cable: That is a good point that I had not thought of, and it may be an avenue to pursue through the FSA or directly through the Financial Secretary. I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention.

An important point was raised by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), when she suggested that the company could now slide towards insolvency. I was worried when the Financial Secretary made her original statement, because on more than one occasion she referred to the possibility of compensation by that route. It would certainly be an easy way out for the Government if compensation had to be paid by the industry and not by the Government. However, it is important to reflect on the implications.

If the industry scheme were to be brought into effect and had to provide substantial compensation in the event of insolvency, we have to ask where the money would come from. In principle, it could come from shareholders' funds in the insurance industry, but some of the leading insurers are mutuals and do not have any shareholders. Whatever happened, many individual policyholders in the insurance industry would end up footing the bill for the disaster. That would come at a time when some participants in the industry are struggling themselves with much tougher insolvency rules imposed by the FSA. My final thought is purely speculative. The Government think that they have drawn a neat line under the episode, but if they force the industry to fund compensation, we could see a cascade effect that caused far greater damage than the original Equitable Life disaster. That is why the Government must think much more constructively about examining the question of maladministration and the consequences of that.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): I have had quite an interest in the Equitable Life issue for some years, not only as a member of the Treasury Committee, but from my constituency experience. All hon. Members probably have constituents who are affected by this affair. I do not know how many of mine are affected, but about 50 of them have given the details of their cases to me, and I have found that information very helpful in pursuing the matter through my membership of the Treasury Committee.

It is important to bear in mind the individual stories that lie behind what we are discussing. Many of the people involved do not have considerable means, but they invested significant sums in what they thought was a highly reputable company, and they are now in retirement in much reduced circumstances. Those people are closely following not only the Treasury Committee's deliberations, but what we say in the House. Many of them have been waiting for Lord Penrose to report. So we have reached a critical juncture in trying to unearth exactly what happened.

Lord Penrose appeared before the Treasury Committee on 16 March—I think that it was the first time for about 40 years that a judge had appeared before a Select Committee—and he gave us extremely important evidence. Of course we wanted to know whether, in his view, he had been given the right terms of reference, and he told us:

"I was the tool that I was given to do the job."

In other words, he set his own terms within his given remit. He has certainly not indicated to us that he was in any way restricted in undertaking the research and investigation that he was asked to do.

Lord Penrose's report enables us to identify key moments in the history of the Equitable Life saga. He shows us that the company was using "actuarial techniques" to create what he calls "apparent surpluses" in the 1970s, that in the early 1990s, and that the accumulation of all that, over 20 or 30 years, led the company to have a £3 billion shortfall by the end of 2000.

"the Society did not again get back to a position of having an excess of assets over the realistic policy values"

After the Treasury Committee took evidence from members of Equitable Life when we opened our inquiry two years ago, we concluded:

"Equitable Life's risky decision in 1993 not to build up a reserve to cover the costs of guaranteed annuity rate liabilities was a crucial turning point."

So it is natural to focus on what Lord Penrose tells us in his report about regulatory system failure. When he was before us last week, commenting on his report, we asked him about regulatory systems failure and he said in evidence:

"One has a growing divergence between what the regulatory system required in the way of information in the annual financial statements of life offices and what the life offices themselves were actually doing in the conduct of their business."

He continued:

"There would be no reaction to growing terminal bonus if terminal bonus was not a focus for regulatory attention . . . I think that critically is what went wrong."

In considering the focus of Lord Penrose's report, the additional comments that he has made in summary form in evidence to the Treasury Committee help to clarify the situation as he finds it, and they bear out exactly what he says at paragraph 69 in chapter 20 of the report:

"the thrust of my criticism is that for the most part it was the system that failed to provide the regulation that changing circumstances in the industry required".

When Lord Penrose was before the Treasury Committee last week, we wanted to ask him to expand on the occasions during this story when key opportunities to reform the regulatory system were missed. The evidence increasingly focuses on the period 1990 to 1994, and discussions of the European Union's third life directive. When Lord Penrose appeared before the Treasury Committee, I put it to him that that was probably an important chance to align the regulatory system with developments in the industry. He answered with the simple word "Yes". He also added that the original formula made it an obligation to make proper provision for terminal bonuses.

[Mr. James Plaskitt]

In this debate, it will be interesting to look briefly at the way in which the third life directive evolved. Lord Penrose gives all the evidence in his report. In 1990, when the original regulation was first put before the committees that dealt with it, it stated:

"the valuation method shall take into account, either implicitly or explicitly, future bonuses of all kinds, in a manner consistent with the other assumptions on future bonuses of all kinds, in a manner consistent with the other assumptions on future experience and with the current method of distribution of bonus."

Subsequently, there were four years of argument before the directive finally emerged and took its place. It in interesting to see how the wording changed. This was the wording that finally appeared in the directive in 1994:

"The amount of the technical life-assurance provisions shall be calculated by a sufficiently prudent prospective actuarial valuation, taking account of all future liabilities as determined by the policy conditions for each existing policy".

That represents a very significant watering down of the directive between 1990 and 1994, so one has to ask how it came to be watered down, and why it emerged in that form and not in the form in which it originally entered the negotiations. In the very chapter in which Lord Penrose looks at the evolution of the directive, he reminds us that it was the United Kingdom delegation that led the resistance to the original wording.

That gives us strong evidence to support the view that there was unnecessarily light-touch regulation at that time, and it clearly points the finger towards why, in the 1990s, an important opportunity to bring the regulation into line with what was happening in the industry was missed.

We have heard the suggestion, or accusation, that after 1997 and the change of Government, the Treasury was passive in relation to all these issues. It is hard to find the evidence to back up that suggestion. The ombudsman, from whom the Treasury Committee heard evidence, said that the Treasury was in no sense passive. He reminded us that in 1998, quite a vigorous battle went on between the Treasury and Equitable Life, with the Treasury threatening to close Equitable Life down, and Equitable Life threatening to take the Treasury to judicial review. That does not suggest that there was passivity on the part of the Treasury.

When the Treasury Committee began to look into the matter back in 2001, it heard evidence about what had been happening immediately after 1997. The prudential insurance regulator became concerned about levels of reserves for the guaranteed annuity rate policies in 1997. The Government Actuary's Department subsequently undertook a survey, and it told us in evidence that Equitable Life stood out among all the other life assurance companies. Immediately afterwards, red letters, as they were called, circulated between the Treasury and the company, raising issues about Equitable Life's potential solvency.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman has certainly done his homework. Is he really arguing that if his current disquisition leads to a conclusion that all the failures occurred before 1997—he knows that I deny that that is the case, but we shall let that be for a moment—and if it emerges that there was both systemic and operational failure before that time, it would affect in any way the issue at stake—the entitlement of current and lost policyholders to possible compensation if there was maladministration? Why does it matter whether the failure occurred before 1997 or afterwards?

Mr. Plaskitt: What matters is unearthing exactly what happened, and that is what Lord Penrose was asked to do. It is essential to look at the totality of his findings, and he helps us to do so by standing back in the final chapter of the report, having looked in detail at events that took place over many years, and asking what basic conclusion one can draw about the causes of the problem. He says, as we know, that the company was first and foremost the architect of its own misfortune, and regulatory system failure played a secondary role.

Mr. Letwin: Why does it matter when that took place? If the hon. Gentleman is making a serious argument about the possible rights of policyholders, is it not incumbent on him to address the question of whether the failure was partly operational, as the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and I have amply shown is demonstrated in the report? Why does the date matter to the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt)—other than as a party political point?

Mr. Plaskitt: I am not making a party political point at all. I am trying to extract from the dense, 800 page-plus Penrose report the essence of its findings, because that is what my constituents and the constituents of other right hon. and hon. Members affected by the affair want to know. They want to know what happened and how it happened.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Surely the question to which our constituents, including the 50 who have been in touch with my hon. Friend, want an answer is: what is to be done now? It is important to understand the analysis and accept that the Conservatives and Equitable Life were to blame, but now we must decide what is to be done to get out of the mess that other people have created. There are avenues available to the Government that might assist with that process.

Mr. Plaskitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. My constituents, and, I am sure, his constituents and others, want to know what happens now. However, unless we understand fully the history of how things happened, we cannot work out correctly what must happen next. That suggestion was put to Lord Penrose as part of his terms of reference. He was asked to advise on what lessons should be learned, and what action should be taken. Action is under way—the ombudsman is undertaking work and there may be court actions. Lord Penrose himself suggested that the situation would eventually lead to litigation. That will be a lengthy process, but without the facts and the history before us, we could never determine what the next steps should be.

One important step is getting the regulatory system right, and the Financial Services Authority has introduced significant changes. Again, we asked Lord Penrose for his view because, having looked into the matter and unearthed important evidence of regulatory system failure, he could judge the current regulatory system against previous shortcomings and determine whether things have improved. In his evidence he was clear that they have, and pointed to resource improvements. For example, there are now twice as many regulators working on the regulation of life insurance companies. I reflected on that when Opposition Members intervened on this subject—I wondered whether the bowler-hatted bureaucrats who feature in their party's recent campaign efforts included the additional regulators who were appointed. If they are suggesting that those people should be removed again, we will slide back to the excessively light-touch regulation that contributed to the problem in the first place.

Secondly, Lord Penrose acknowledges that the organisational structure of regulation is now far better. Different skills are working together and are located in the life offices—a complete change from what happened before. Lord Penrose welcomes the regulatory system changes referred to as the "twin peaks" arrangement—traditional paper-based solvency investigation and measures allied to the broader factor. When he looks at the regulatory system in place now, he concludes:

> "My clear impression is that the approach now being adopted is a very considerable improvement on what there was before."

That will reassure constituents who want to know whether the lessons have been learned from the whole tragic affair.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman should go back and talk to his constituents who have been affected. I have no sense that constituents who have written to me have the slightest concern about the regulatory system. What they want to know is what is being done about their position. The Penrose report specifically states that compensation was not an issue that he considered or was asked to consider. If the hon. Gentleman is arguing that regulatory failure contributed to what happened—he is now explaining why the improvements that he says his Government introduced have made a difference to that—does he not therefore think that a proper investigation into the question of maladministration would now be appropriate?

Mr. Plaskitt: We have had an investigation conducted by Lord Penrose into the regulatory system failure. The other questions are entirely separate. We have rehearsed many times in the course of this discussion how those will be taken forward. The hon. Gentleman is right. Our constituents want to know that, but I do not think he is suggesting that there should be a Government-underwritten compensation scheme. If he is suggesting that, he needs to explain how we will overcome the moral hazard issue that such a scheme would raise.

To conclude, we have a story of manipulation, concealment and misrepresentation by Equitable Life. We have evidence of a domineering and manipulative chief executive, an inert board and institutional laziness and complacency, all underpinned by an inadequate regulatory system that was itself endorsed by policy decisions designed to prevent appropriate regulation coming into place. In the course of reading Lord Penrose's report one comes across a paper written by Mr. Ranson of Equitable Life delighting in the title, "With Profits Without Mystery". From the perspective of Equitable Life's policyholders, it is more a case of "with losses without honesty".

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Despite the differences of emphasis in the debate tonight, hon. Members in all parts of the House are united in the view that the case of Equitable Life has been a tragic state of affairs that has caused problems not just for those who have lost money as a result of what happened, but for the whole country. The entire financial system on which the pensions of the future and the security of many of our people depend has been challenged and weakened by what happened with Equitable Life.

I agree with the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) that lessons need to be learned. We need to understand what went wrong and ensure that it cannot happen again. To that extent we may agree, but as for the rest of his comments, and the comments of the Minister and other Labour Members, I find it depressing and disappointing—and I know that my constituents who have suffered in the affair will find it equally depressing and disappointing—that the Government's only real response in the wake of the Penrose report is to try to focus the criticism on the regulatory regime before 1997, and thus on the Conservative Government.

We need to set aside party politics, understand what went wrong and explore still further the questions that remain unanswered. We must provide real responses that our constituents will understand and that will leave them with a sense that their anxieties, questions and complaints are being properly addressed and not, as I fear, left to one side. As I listen to Labour Members, I am left with the sense that my constituents' concerns are being left to one side.

I received a letter just this morning from one of my constituents and it is difficult to argue against the simplicity of what he says. He writes:

> "Equitable Life was at one time highly respected being the oldest mutual life office in the world. The management certainly made mistakes and behaved in an arrogant manner but it is up to the Regulator to protect the Public's interest. It is after all what he is there for!"

It is clear that the regulator, in whatever shape, form or system, did not fulfil that remit. Ultimately, as I said to the Financial Secretary in my intervention, even up to the latter days before the House of Lords judgment, even when discussions were taking place between the Treasury, the FSA and Equitable Life, my constituents and others around the country were still being sold policies that would quickly turn into a disaster for them.

The reality was that, throughout the process, from start to finish, people were let down by the system and the regulation, as well as by the management of the organisation itself. That the Financial Secretary should set her face against the simple question of whether there was maladministration is extraordinary and inexplicable. I cannot for the life of me see how she believes that she will benefit politically. Out there are thousands of people who are waiting upon her decisions, waiting upon the views and decisions of the House, who believe that it would be right and appropriate for there to be an investigation into whether there was maladministration, and it is simply not happening.

Lord Penrose is clear in what he says. The Financial Secretary intervened on the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and quoted the last sentence of paragraph 77 of chapter 20 of the report, but at the beginning of that paragraph Lord Penrose states:

"Many readers of this report will be frustrated that it has not provided answers to two questions: who is at fault for the problems encountered by the Society, and who deserves redress as a consequence? It has been no part of this inquiry to attempt to answer either question."

He goes on to say:

"The first inevitably involves issues of the scope of duty and of breach of duty that I was not asked to consider and that I would have been unwilling to consider as part of an inquisitorial process."

So not only was Lord Penrose not asked to deal with, and did not deal with, those issues, he believed that that aspect of what went on should not have been part of his remit. Surely, if nothing else, he is arguing in support of the requests of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and of others inside the House and outside it for a simple process that asks the question: was there maladministration?

There has been debate over the ombudsman's ability to provide a proper assessment of what happened. It has been suggested that the Government Actuary's Department is not within the ombudsman's remit and therefore there is nothing that the ombudsman can do. But as my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) has made clear, the reality is that, if the House were united, those changes, adjustments to the system and changes to the remit of the ombudsman, could be pushed through quickly. The disappointing thing, of course, is that that united support does not exist within the House.

I want to press the Financial Secretary on her challenging of the regulatory regime that existed before 1997. I looked back today at the letters that I have received from constituents about their experiences of what went wrong and I have read carefully the sections of the report that walk us through what happened after 1997. It is clear that discussions were taking place within the Treasury when it took over the role of regulator after 1998, and then within the FSA when it took over the job of regulation shortly after that. There were robust debates and serious questions were being asked about the solvency of Equitable Life.

When the Minister made her statement to the House a couple of weeks ago, she referred several times to discussions that took place in the years up to 2000–01. She will remember referring to information about reinsurance being withheld from the regulator, which she said took place in the latter days of the last decade. That happened under the new regime, albeit in its infancy as an alternative system. Such questions as, "Where did the regulatory system fall down?" must, by definition, apply as much to what occurred after 1997 as to what took place before 1997.

I have read various sections of the report, which the Minister will know better than I do. Chapter 17, page 611, specifically refers to

"a meeting called at HMT's request to discuss the Society's approach to the annuity guarantees and the solvency implication of reserving for them."

The Government Actuary's Department addressed the solvency issue shortly afterwards in a document produced in December 1998, saying:

"While this is reassuring it should be realised that publication of such a low solvency position is likely to severely undermine the company's reputation in the market and could threaten its survival as an independent entity."

At that point in 1998, serious discussions were taking place within the Treasury about whether Equitable Life was founded on stone or sand. Yet, when I read the letters from my constituents, I found that a significant number of them began their involvement with Equitable Life at that time. Those people did not take out policies in the 1970s or 1980s but were sold policies right up until the turn of the decade, and even beyond, and they lost money.

Among those letters, I found an example of a constituent who challenged some of Equitable Life's operational practices. He made a number of claims about how policies were sold to him, and, indeed, denied ever signing contracts with Equitable Life. None the less, he was placed under heavy selling pressure by Equitable Life salesmen in 1999 who were trying to persuade him to take up business with them. Some 25 to 30 per cent. of the people who wrote to me to complain took out policies at the end of the 1990s, and I cannot understand how the Minister can turn round to them and say, "There was a dodgy regime in place before we took office. We did something about it, and that is the end of the matter." That is essentially the message that the Government have given to my constituents. I ask the Minister to think again about the sole message that this House is sending to all the people affected in my constituency, her constituency and those of other hon. Members: "The regulatory regime did not work. We have changed it so it will all be fine for the future."

There is also the question whether operational failure led directly to financial loss. I must say that I was surprised by Lord Penrose's comment that there was no direct connection between regulatory failure and financial loss. If that were the case, why, when the Treasury and the FSA were discussing the solvency of Equitable Life, was the society still permitted to go out and sell policies to my constituents, who, within a very few years, suffered substantial financial loss as a result? The Minister may shake her head and smile, but my constituents will not understand why the regulator was not involved in what happened to them. Surely the House has a duty to see the matter through to the end. We have a duty to all those who lost money to look in every corner for what may or may not have happened. They are asking us to send the case back to the ombudsman for a proper investigation into whether there was maladministration. Is there really any reason why the Government should not say yes to that investigation?

I suggest to the Minister that there is a danger that, as she sits in her office in the Treasury considering regulatory issues, she may take her eye off the real ball—the fact that thousands of pensioners out there have lost money and their retirements will not be the same. We have a duty to them to see this through to the end by granting the investigation to determine whether there was maladministration and whether they have a case for compensation. If she fails to do that, she will let down not only those people, but this whole place and the whole reputation of politics and Government. She must change her mind, she must send them the right message, and she must do it now.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): Like every other Member, I have constituents whose pension plans and retirement aspirations are much reduced as a result of the Equitable Life fiasco. I have an interest as a representative of those constituents and a further interest as chair of the all-party group on building societies and financial mutuals.

I join the Minister and other Members in expressing sympathy for those people affected by this fiasco. That was brought home to me today when I had coffee with a distinguished member of the local business community, who confided in me that he was still working only because Equitable Life had not delivered on his pension and, in turn, his retirement plans.

On compensation, the Government's response is consistent with that which took place following other pension fiascos and, on some occasions, scandals. Nobody can argue that the Government cannot underwrite risks, then say that Equitable Life is a special case, given that Penrose himself blames the company, not the regulators. I look back to the Maxwell scandal at the Daily Mirror. I appreciate that the pensioners affected by Equitable Life have been badly hit—in some cases, the impact has been devastating—but it was exactly the same for the Daily Mirror pensioners. There were huge issues of corporate governance in that case, too, but the Government did not rush in to compensate.

Another such episode, and another sorry legacy of the former Tory Government's regulatory regime, was that of pensions mis-selling. On that occasion, the industry itself had to compensate people who were sold pensions on false pretences. If the Government were to step in on this occasion, I wonder whether the companies that paid out that compensation would come to them to demand that they underwrite the bad management and mis-selling that took place all those years ago.

Mr. Letwin: Of course, everybody recognises that in many cases no question of compensation arises, but does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the distinction lies in the question of whether there was maladministration? That distinction was recognised by Parliament and by the current Chancellor in relation to the Barlow Clowes case, in which compensation was payable because maladministration was ascertained.

Mr. Bailey: Penrose says that there was no maladministration in this case. Frankly, many of the constituents whose perspective Conservative Members have assumed will not understand the subtleties and refinements of whether that is so. The fact is that they took up schemes that, one way or another, did not deliver on their pension aspirations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) made a valuable point about the statement made earlier this month, when he noted that the Financial Times expert had said that, even after all the problems, some of Equitable Life's returns were no worse than those of some other companies, so how could we justify compensating those pension holders and not those in other companies that had failed to deliver for totally different reasons? That would be difficult to justify.

I want to deal with my concerns about the mutual sector. It has been pointed out on a number of occasions that the problem at Equitable Life related to management. The quote often given from the Penrose report is that

> "The Society's uniqueness lay in the approach adopted by its management, not in the essential characteristics of its business."

Central to that was the fact that the chief executive officer was also the actuary, and that the company pursued a policy of failing to keep adequate reserves, overpaying bonuses and failing to keep the board informed of the position and the risks involved.

The report also makes it clear that the critical responsibility for valuing liabilities, assessing the liability implications of new products and identifying risk was discharged by a discrete part of the organisation that was not subject to effective scrutiny or challenge. Obviously, monitoring needs to be improved, and improvements are also needed in corporate governance. We must be clear, however, that because this organisation was a mutual, policyholders did not see their obligation as one of scrutiny, as might be the case for a shareholder in a conventional plc. This distinction was pointed out in Penrose. Most policyholders who take out a policy in a mutual see their obligation as simply to pay a premium, but to have no extra responsibility.

Under the articles of Equitable Life, the policyholders were effectively powerless. My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton made the point about their registration under the provisions of the Companies Act 1989, which provide for a 10 per cent. vote to get a special meeting. That is, of course, impossible if there is no adequate register or access to a register for policyholders. Mutuals have to find a means whereby they can provide for policyholder participation.

I welcome, as do other mutuals, the Treasury initiative set up by Sir Paul Myners to look into corporate governance and policyholder representation in mutual life offices. The Minister has already set out the terms of reference, so I will not go over them again. It is fair to say that the mutual life assurance industry accepts the need to take action to improve representation by policyholders. We must make it clear, however, that the situation at Equitable Life arose not because it was a mutual but because the management policy was bad and, indeed, not even compatible with the basic principles of mutuality.

The initiative raises the challenge to ensure that the corporate governance of mutual life offices provides the necessary checks and balances to ensure that a saga such as this is never repeated. I am sure that there will be a dialogue between Sir Paul Myners and the mutual sector to ensure that steps are taken to prevent any such repetition.

[Mr. Bailey]

I want to conclude by making these particular points. Equitable Life has reached this situation because of poor management, not the structural issue with mutual ownership. That could happen with plcs. Independent Insurance went bust, despite the fact that it was a plc. There is no guarantee, even with a plc, that shareholders will bail it out and there are plenty of examples of shareholders letting a plc collapse.

The mutual life offices recognise the fact that this episode highlights issues of governance and involvement of policyholders, but we must make it clear that it is a one-off. Equitable Life is not representative of the mutual industry as a whole and it is as anxious as anybody to ensure that its rules and procedures prevent any repeat of this with a mutual company.

8.6 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): If the only pension arrangements people have are with Equitable Life, they are likely to think that it is representative of the mutual system, so I am not at all sure that the perhaps not intentionally but none the less effectively complacent attitude with which the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) finished provides us with a helpful analysis of where we are.

I want, if I may, to pick up, but not too seriously, a point made by the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt). He thought that Lord Penrose was the first judge to appear before a Select Committee for 40 years. I was on the Home Affairs Committee in 1992–93 and judges regularly appeared before it. Of course, judges chair Select Committees in the House of Lords.

If this were the Court of Appeal, and it is not, and Lord Justice Letwin as opposed to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) had given judgment as opposed to having made a speech, I could say, "I have heard what Lord Justice Letwin says and I have nothing further to add." However, he has not given judgment. We are in the House of Commons and I am here to represent my constituents and to say what I believe ought to be done in a political sense as a consequence of this fiasco.

I have already declared my interest as the former holder of a number of Equitable Life policies. I continue to hold, I think, one further policy with it, so clearly I have been affected, and may continue to be affected, by what has happened. I have not yet reached the stage at which I am prepared to be as generous as my right hon. Friend in the event of compensation being provided, but I put that to one side.

Many of my constituents, like those of other hon. Members, have been affected by this disaster. Some are members of the Equitable members action group and some are not, but all have been adversely affected. The number runs into the hundreds—we are not talking about just one, two or three isolated individuals.

The dilemma that my constituents face is exacerbated when one considers that those people are not in a position to repair the damage done to them. They are, by and large, at the end of their working life or have finished it, so they do not have the economic ability to get another job to refill their pension pot. I accept that not every injury commands a remedy. Plenty of people suffer accidents, be they financial, commercial or physical. Those do not require compensation, but we are considering rather different circumstances.

I can say on behalf of my constituents that all who have been affected by this disaster welcomed the setting up of the Penrose inquiry and, to a greater or lesser degree, they have welcomed its findings. However, where they, and I on their behalf, complain is in respect of what the public authorities have done and propose to do. What they—my constituents—say about the management of Equitable Life is unprintable. Disquiet is growing, however, about the Government's response, and I regret, as I have huge respect for the Financial Secretary, that that disquiet will be in no degree lessened by her response in her statement on 8 March or in her opening speech today.

The appearance—I can put it no higher than that—which comes not only from the Government but from other agencies, is that all is well, all the mistakes were in the past, and that that is all that needs to be done about it. I note that the Financial Services Authority's press release, which enclosed the letter that the chairman, Mr. McCarthy, wrote to the Financial Secretary on 8 March, says, under "Notes for editors":

> "The FSA regulates the financial services industry and has four objectives under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000: maintaining market confidence; promoting public understanding of the financial system; the protection of consumers; and fighting financial crime. The FSA aims to maintain efficient, orderly and clean financial markets and help retail consumers achieve a fair deal."

My constituents are entitled to ask whether the FSA, in its handling of this affair, has come up to its remit.

The chairman of the FSA, in his letter to the Financial Secretary, says that Lord Penrose

> "makes clear that the issues on which he comments can be settled definitively only by resolution in the courts or by some other adjudicator."

Some other adjudicator, as was pointed out by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), could mean a reborn Penrose. He has already found facts, and he is tremendously well placed to be that other adjudicator. I am depressed, however, that the chairman of the FSA thinks it appropriate—as does the Financial Secretary, I fear—to require our constituents to go to court to seek redress.

Mr. Barnes: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman feel that the Government could be involved in a compensation scheme that was in some way based on need? Different people are in different sets of circumstances—I am not sure whether I want to see him compensated, but numbers of his constituents might be much more deserving cases because their pensions and future provision have gone, and they might therefore be reasonably considered by the Government to be on a list for some percentage of compensation.

Mr. Garnier: I was simply making my personal interest clear, and I do not wish to personalise this debate at all. I can see that there is some argument to be made, and the telling question from the Labour Benches was that asked by the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes): what are the Government going to do? Were it to involve some form of means-tested compensation scheme, let us look at it. That is an advance from him, however, which we have not yet heard from his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench. At least he is addressing his mind to the real moral and political questions which this debate throws up, and which I fear that the authorities and the Government are ignoring.

It seems to me that the Government are hiding behind the Penrose report. The Financial Secretary quoted large chunks—she spent about 20 or 30 minutes doing so—of the report at the beginning of her speech. That is not difficult. The more difficult political and moral question is to ask what flows from the findings of fact that Lord Penrose has made. I have heard nothing from the Government other than that my constituents are urged to go to court, but this Government have removed access to legal aid, and therefore access to the courts, for these much-put-upon people. Any court case would take years to prepare, and if not a year, certainly months to reach a conclusion at trial.

We need only look at the current court case involving the BCCI scandal, which took place some years ago, to realise that. It will take the High Court many months to dispose of that case—and given that one party is bound to be dissatisfied with the result, it will go to the Court of Appeal and, no doubt, to the House of Lords. So we are not looking at an easy way out, however easily the words "go to court" trip off the ministerial tongue.

What else did the Minister say? She said "We have set up the Myners review and the Morris review." I should have thought that the House was fed up with hearing the Government talk about reviews. They have had more "reviews" than Raymond. It is time that they started to do something rather than pushing issues over the political horizon.

We are all immensely grateful for what Lord Penrose has done, but what a judge cannot do is provide a Government with political answers. We saw that with the Scott inquiry and the Hutton inquiry, and we are seeing it with the Saville inquiry. We have four judges who have held, or are in the process of holding, well-organised and well-designed inquiries, and they do their job; but they do their job as finders of fact rather than as providers of political and economic answers. It is wrong of the Government to say "Penrose has reported: we need do no more."

I believe that this saga points to a need to do away finally with the compulsory annuity system. The Minister and I debated that at some length last year, and I might remind her that my Retirement Income Reform Bill achieved a Second Reading by a majority of 101—not bad for a private Member's Bill, if I may say so.

What this whole saga demonstrates is that the Government are failing to get a grip on the underlying problems of financial provision for the elderly. I have a number of elderly constituents who will be financially severely embarrassed as a consequence of this disaster. It highlights the need for liberalisation of the way in which people can invest for their retirement. The Government insist that people should be forced to buy annuities with their pension pot at 75. If the public are no longer prepared to trust financial institutions, for goodness' sake let them choose their own means of saving and investing for their retirement—and while they are about it, I urge the Government to listen very carefully indeed to what has been said by my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Twickenham. There they may find an escape route, and I urge them to burrow into it.

8.18 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I know that others wish to speak, so I shall curtail my remarks.

Rarely does the failure of a company have an impact on so many lives in such a personal way as has the mismanagement at Equitable Life. More than 1 million policyholders have been affected, and the reputation of a whole industry has been tarnished. The constituents of mine who were unlucky enough to be policyholders tell me of the financial difficulties that they suffer as a result of Equitable Life's mismanagement, and the financial insecurity that that brings them. Many had saved solely with Equitable Life because it had a good name and they believed that the Government of the day had put in place an effective regulatory system. In fact, as with many investors, they were wrong. Despite rapid change and evolution in the market, the then Government failed to make substantive changes to the regulatory system.

In his detailed report, Lord Penrose notes that in 1988, nine years before the current Government took office, a Department of Trade and Industry Minister—the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—made a conscious decision not to update the regulation of life insurance. It was just one of a catalogue of decisions to continue that Government's light-touch regulatory system, which was in the end to have such a disastrous effect on my constituents and so many others throughout the country.

The 1988 decision was compounded by decisions in the early '90s that saw Conservative Members lobbying against changes that would have made the Equitable fiasco at least remote, if not impossible. The Government of the day lobbied against a Brussels directive that would have placed a statutory responsibility on companies to set aside reserves for terminal bonuses. The then Government viewed that as overly cautious, and suggested that a tougher regulatory system would have created too much red tape. Perhaps Conservative Members could therefore explain to my constituents, who are indeed cautious and save diligently, what would have been over-cautious about offering them protection and asking companies to abide by the most basic process of reserving.

Mr. Barnes: My hon. Friend is correct in pointing to the previous Conservative Government's errors and omissions. However, if the Conservatives were still in office now that Penrose has revealed all these errors, what would have to be done, and would that Government not be obliged to move towards compensation? What difference is there because we have a Labour Government? We have to pick up the mess that the Conservatives left us in.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend makes his own points, but I would hazard that if it were the case that Opposition Members were now on the Government Benches, we would never have had a Penrose report, because they would have known full well what it would show.

[Mr. Gardiner]

In some cases, it is possible to say that hindsight makes our vision somewhat clearer, but I do not believe that that was the case in the regulation of the financial services industry.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Mr. Gardiner: I shall not give way, because I need to make progress. The right hon. Gentleman has had plenty of time to make his points this evening, and he was not as generous as my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary in taking interventions.

I do not believe that that was the case with the regulation of the financial services industry, because it would be too generous to say that Tory failures properly to regulate the financial services industry could be explained only with hindsight. I say that because other financial services organisations had already realised the need for more effective regulation. By 1986, regulation was already in place to support the wish of the Association of Friendly Societies to offer a voluntary compensation scheme. That scheme, which guaranteed 90 per cent. of a guaranteed policy, was already operating successfully and could have been used as a role model, yet the then Government decided not to move forward with a similar scheme. I am pleased to say that the current Government saw the need for such a scheme and introduced the financial services compensation scheme as part of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. That scheme protects consumers if companies become insolvent now.

In 1997, this Government inherited a hotch-potch of a regulatory system from the previous Government, who favoured cutting red tape over protecting consumers. Neither I nor this Government want more red tape, but I do want effective regulation. Conservative Members play a devious game when they portray all regulation as red tape, as they have recently in the Chamber. As someone who spent 10 years running a successful business, I understand the impact that red tape can have on a business and how it can stifle a company's competitive edge, but I also understand that with ineffective regulation it is usually the big firms that benefit, not the small consumers. Large investors can spread their risk and hedge their bets; small investors cannot and do not.

In his report, Lord Penrose concluded:

"Principally, the Society was the author of its own misfortunes."

That was because the regulatory system that the Conservative Government had in place was weak and ineffective. Without an effective regulatory system, the rules were not there for Equitable to break, and there were few mechanisms to alert the authorities to Equitable's failures. The primary problem was not that the regulator did not implement existing regulations properly, but that the regulations that existed were not the proper ones.

The Opposition's position is fundamentally this: they want to parade themselves as the champions of the policyholders, but they do not want to find themselves committed to compensating those policyholders should they ever be in government. That is why they have suggested the device of an inquiry to establish whether there was maladministration and whether compensation is therefore due. That, however, is a specious argument, which does them no credit—and I make my points because of the logic of the shadow Chancellor's own arguments. The Opposition claim not merely that there was an inadequate regulatory system, but that the operation of such a system as there was, was itself inadequate. If they are convinced that operational failure occurred, why do they not follow their own logic and say that there was also maladministration, and that compensation is therefore due? The answer is that it is difficult for them to justify a commitment to spending upwards of £3 billion in compensation to policyholders when they are already committed to cutting £18 billion off the police, defence, housing and education budgets.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I should begin by declaring an interest as a former policyholder. I was one of the lucky ones: I did not have all my eggs in one basket, but the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) has reminded us today of the many people who suffered great losses as a result of this debacle. As recently as this week, I received an e-mail from a constituent—he is of modest means—reminding me that he had lost 23 per cent. of his pension, with another 10 per cent. still to go.

I want to draw attention to what many consider to be the misleading nature of the Government's response to the Penrose report, and to look at where we go from here. The Financial Secretary said in her statement to Parliament:

"Lord Penrose makes no recommendation for the payment of compensation."

The implication of that is that compensation should not flow from Lord Penrose's findings, but in fact the position is very different: such an outcome was simply beyond his remit. He was not asked to consider it, and he did not consider it. The Financial Secretary then said:

"Nor does he conclude that economic loss was caused to policyholders by the regulatory system."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1258.]

She then prayed in aid the report, which states that

"it is not enough in this case, to infer from the coincidence of systems deficiencies and loss that one caused or contributed to the other."

However, when Lord Penrose appeared before the Treasury Select Committee, I said to him,

"but saying you cannot infer one from the other crucially is not the same" as saying that

"you do not rule it out. It is simply not part of your remit".

Lord Penrose replied:

"That is so."

I then said,

"So you cannot rule out the possibility that compensation does flow from failures of the regulatory system?"

That, of course, is the very issue that we are discussing this evening. Lord Penrose replied:

"I have sought to avoid adjudicating one way or the other."

In other words, the question remains to be asked, considered and determined.

In her statement to Parliament, the Financial Secretary made great play of the fact that the regulatory system failures were secondary factors—an issue that the Conservative spokesman raised during his contribution this evening. The Financial Secretary pointed out the report's conclusion that "the Society was the author of its own misfortunes."

Indeed, she repeated that point in her evidence to the Select Committee. But as Lord Penrose confirmed to the Committee, it is almost inevitably the case that regulatory failure is secondary. The initial problem is a company that is not behaving properly. It is then for the regulator to sort out that problem, and such action is secondary to the original problem. So to assert that regulatory failure is a secondary factor is merely to state the obvious. The conclusions that the Financial Secretary draws from the Penrose report are therefore not justified.

What does the report tell us? It tells us that there were systemic failures, and it clearly points to a failure to modernise the system of regulation. But it also points in many paragraphs to failures on the part of regulators within a flawed system: in other words, operational failure. Mention has been made of several such examples this evening, and I shall not discuss them given the lack of time, save for one. In talking about the Government Actuary's Department, Penrose says that "the standards of scrutiny still impress me as complacent, lacking challenge and hesitant in criticism and in following up on any criticism made."

That is a pretty damning criticism of how the Government Actuary's Department operated—a matter to which I shall return later.

What has been the Government's response to the key issue of what should be done for policyholders? The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire constantly reminded us of the centrality of that issue. The Financial Secretary referred to the financial services ombudsman, whose role is to consider individual claims, but also, crucially, to consider individual complaints of mis-selling. That process is wholly irrelevant to all those who have no specific complaints about mis-selling, but have simply suffered a substantial loss as a result of what has happened over the last few years. The more successful the claims pursued through the financial ombudsman service, the more likely it is that the company will be driven into insolvency.

It seems to me that the Government could be accused of being reckless in standing by and allowing that to happen. Should the company become insolvent, the financial services compensation scheme will come into play, which will result in the rest of the industry—particularly the policyholders of other life companies—bearing the cost of this debacle. Is that any fairer than the taxpayer picking up the tab? It seems to me that the one option is no fairer than the other. The Government's response is a recipe for years of litigation and years of claims being made through the financial ombudsman service, with lawyers and no one else being the beneficiaries. Surely it would be better to find a more ordered way forward than that suggested by the Government's response.

To establish what job is now required, I go back to what Lord Penrose said in his evidence to the Select Committee. He talked about the gates that one has to go through in law to establish compensation flowing from failure. He talked about establishing a duty of care—first establishing that a breach of that duty had taken place, then establishing what should flow from it. That is what now has to happen. We should attempt to determine what, if any, compensation flows from the regulatory failures identified by Lord Penrose. That is the essential next step, so how can we best achieve it?

The Financial Secretary refers only to the courts as the place where those issues should be considered, but that is simply not an option for most policyholders. We can therefore reflect on three other options. First, the parliamentary ombudsman. It is already clear that in many respects the report already published on a narrow time period has been substantially undermined by Lord Penrose's findings. The parliamentary ombudsman should be prepared to recognise that now, and to re-open her inquiry.

It is my belief that the Government Actuary's Department is arbitrarily excluded from the scope of the parliamentary ombudsman. There is no case in logic for its continuing exclusion. The report is riddled with findings of negligent regulatory failure in respect of how the Government Actuary's Department carried out its functions. That should be remedied by the Government without delay. Not to do so is a cynical exercise designed simply to prevent any challenge to the GAD's exercise of its functions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) referred to the second option of an extended remit for Lord Penrose. That should be seriously considered. Let us face it, he understands the subject, so he is in the best possible position to look again into the problem of compensation on the basis of the findings of fact that he produced.

Finally, there is the proposal from Peter Martin, a former non-executive director of Equitable Life. He has put forward the possibility of a mediation process involving a retired Law Lord or Court of Appeal judge. In respect of the Penrose report, he suggests that that person would conduct an "'early neutral evaluation' of the legal liability aspects of its findings of fact and expressions of view with the purpose of bringing all parties into discussions to effect an overall disposal of all claims. This would have to be strictly confidential to the parties but all would have to 'buy in'"— and by that he means policyholders, the Equitable Life Assurance Society, the Treasury, the FSA, Ernst & Young and the former directors.

Surely, that process deserves proper consideration. In the Treasury Committee last week, I asked the Financial Secretary two or three times whether she ruled out such an approach. She did not do so, and I hope that she will consider that option seriously, as it seems to me to be a way of avoiding years of uncertainty. Unless we find an orderly way forward, the impact of the Equitable Life disaster—on its victims, and on confidence in the industry in general—will be very severe.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): The only interest that I wish to declare is that I have a large number of constituents who have been deeply affected by this matter. Quite rightly, they remain in close touch with me about it.

Tonight, we should be working out what is to be done for those who have been affected, and how to restore trust in the industry and in Britain's savings culture. We should do that together, and the debate should have been largely non-partisan. However, the problem for the House—and not just for those on the Opposition Front Bench—is that the Government, through their response to the report, have rejected working together to sort the matter out. I very much regret that.

The Financial Secretary is an intelligent and thoughtful woman, and I was very surprised and disappointed by the disingenuity of her statement on 8 March. This evening's debate has restored some balance, and it is worth going through some of the key points that have been raised.

First, there is the question of whether all, or almost all, of the regulatory failure took place before 1997. That is what the Financial Secretary asserted, and in doing so she diminished the Government, and politics, a little. Several annuity holders and policyholders have written or e-mailed me, saying that that is more or less what they expect of politicians. I regret that that is the sort of response that I have had.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman is dwelling on when the regulatory system failed, but what does he make of Lord Penrose's comment in paragraph 162 of chapter 19? There, he says that, in the 1980s and 1990s, there were

"specific proposals for change that Ministers did not pursue."

Why was that?

Mr. Tyrie: That is probably right. I do not know: I have not looked into enough of the detail in the back papers to be sure. Neither has the hon. Gentleman, as he is only reading Lord Penrose's conclusions. Further on in the report, he will find a litany of regulatory failure that happened after 1997. There are pages and pages of that, and failure at the operational level. The hon. Gentleman is making exactly the sort of partial and partisan remarks that do him and his party no credit. The hundreds of thousands of people who have been affected by the firm's collapse will take note.

Opposition Members do not dispute Lord Penrose's conclusions about the early 1990s. It would be helpful if the Government abandoned their denial of the shortcomings of the regulatory system and of the operational regulatory failure evident after 1997.

Secondly, the Financial Secretary sought to insert into the debate the question of light-touch regulation. She tried to attribute blame for the Equitable Life crisis to the light-touch approach of the previous Conservative Government. That may or may not be true, as the issue is very complicated. What is certainly not true is that the Labour Government abandoned that approach for something different when they came to power. On the contrary, as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) has said, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), when he was Chief Secretary, endorsed light-touch regulation. He did not do so when he arrived at the Treasury and while he worked out what to do: he did so a full two years after Labour came to power. He said, in an even more forceful statement than that cited by my right hon. Friend, that the Financial Services Authority

"will operate according to a philosophy based on light-touch regulation with protection where necessary and fairness throughout. The Bill"—

the Financial Services and Markets Bill—

"will reduce regulation".—[Official Report, 28 June 1999; Vol. 334, c. 35.]

That does not sit squarely with the Financial Secretary's earlier portrayal of the Government's approach to regulation.

Mr. Gardiner: Does not the hon. Gentleman appreciate the distinction between a light touch in a system of regulation that is wholly inadequate—as I am sure he would accept the previous system was—and a light touch in a system of regulation that is robust?

Mr. Tyrie: I am afraid that I find that question incomprehensible. I shall look at it in Hansard and have another go at it, but for the moment I shall move on.

The remarks by the then Chief Secretary sound like an endorsement of a regulatory system that failed. Indeed, that is exactly what the Financial Secretary appears to say about the regulatory system before 1997. The only problem is that it is a description of the system after 1997. Sleight of hand is everywhere. The Financial Secretary looks puzzled, but puzzlement is probably preferable to the knowing understanding of the issue that she has adopted so far.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. Gentleman is being partisan.

Mr. Tyrie: We have been forced into making such remarks by the presentation of the Penrose report by the Financial Secretary on 8 March. On the compensation scheme, she told the House that "the Government have introduced the comprehensive financial services compensation scheme, which is ready, were problems to materialise in a company, to pay out 90 per cent. of guaranteed policy values."

Several policyholders thought that that might help them, but the truth is that it is not a new scheme but an amalgam of two existing schemes. Moreover, it will not help existing Equitable policyholders, as the Financial Secretary well knows, because it underwrites only the guaranteed amount of any policy, not the terminal bonuses that have been lost. She held out false hopes to many people with those remarks. Some of them have written to me and I expect that they will write to her in due course.

The hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) raised the issue of whether Lord Penrose could consider compensation. The Financial Secretary said

"Lord Penrose makes no recommendation for the payment of compensation."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1270, 58.]

Of course he did not do so: he was not asked to. Furthermore, he said only last week in Scotland that he did not make any recommendations about policyholder compensation because it formed

"no part of my remit".

Ruth Kelly: How does the hon. Gentleman respond to the comment by Lord Penrose in the foreword to the report that "There was no mechanism that could have been devised, and put into effect within a time scale that would have had regard to the wider public interest in obtaining the account of the developments of the Society's position, that could have accommodated in parallel the investigation and resolution of disputed contentions of conformity or non-conformity with generally accepted norms of practice in any of the fields that would have been relevant."?

Mr. Tyrie: The Financial Secretary seems to say that the situation is so complicated that we cannot handle it and no scheme could be devised to do so. Of course it could, and Lord Penrose could be asked to consider that. I strongly agree with the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on that point. Having spent two and a half years considering the issue, Lord Penrose could work up a scheme and a methodology for working out whether compensation should be paid—in other words, to establish liability—and then what that compensation should be. The fact is that Lord Penrose was not asked to do that. The Government did not want the answers, so they did not even ask the questions.

Perhaps the worst misrepresentation involves the ombudsman's role. The Financial Secretary said that the parliamentary ombudsman

"has cleared the Government of all cases of maladministration."

That is like clearing the fox of killing the chickens without bothering to look at the hencoop. The ombudsman has only looked at one case. She has only been allowed to look at 18 months of a 20-year problem. Moreover, she made it clear that she was unable even to inquire into the workings of the key Department—the Government Actuary's Department—where most of the litany of regulatory failure cited in the Penrose report appears to have emanated. So the Government, particularly the Government Actuary's Department, have not been cleared of anything at all, but that has not stopped the Financial Secretary saying:

"There is no issue after 1997 in Lord Penrose's report that has not been considered by the parliamentary ombudsman".—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1270.]

What an absurd remark. I leave that lying there for the people listening to the debate to judge its plausibility.

At the start of the debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset went carefully through each stage of the Financial Secretary's argument. We can now see more clearly why that line of argument has been developed: because it is the Government's best defence for doing nothing to help the policyholders who have been hit. First, she said that the management were to blame. Few hon. Members dispute that. She then said that the regulatory failure was secondary and systemic. Lord Penrose's report shows it to have been significant and operational. She then sought to create the impression that all the regulatory failures took place before 1997, but much of it took place after 1997—not that that distinction should matter to a responsible Government. She was chuckling away at that moment ago.

The Financial Secretary sought to create the impression that light-touch regulation was an exclusively Conservative policy; but, as we know, it was the Government's policy when they framed the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Finally and most perniciously, she sought to imply that there was no maladministration. In fact, no systematic effort has been made to look for maladministration. The Government are preventing the ombudsman from looking in the one place where it is most likely to be found: the Government Actuary's Department.

The Financial Secretary and the rest of the Government can do one simple and sensible thing now: they should get on with amending the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, to enable the parliamentary ombudsman to examine the workings of the Government Actuary's Department. Only then will we know whether the litany of regulatory failure identified by Lord Penrose constitutes maladministration, and we can then get clear recommendations on compensation. The Government could make that amendment tomorrow if they chose to do so. They could get on with it right away. The Financial Secretary shakes her head in disagreement. Perhaps she would like to explain why she could not do that tomorrow.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman must realise that secondary legislation cannot be used to make retrospective changes of the kind that he advocates.

Mr. Tyrie: If the Financial Secretary looks at the Parliamentary Commissioners Act 1967, she will find a specific section that enables her to do so, and it is absolutely incredible that she should be denying that. I hope that I can find it—oh I can—how convenient. It states:

"A complaint under this Act may be made in respect of matters which arose before the commencement of this Act".

I have been advised that a complaint can therefore be made that relates to matters that occurred before the commencement of an amendment to the Act.

Another crucial passage in the Act says that "a complaint not made within that period" may none the less be considered if "there are special circumstances which make it proper to do so."

So the ombudsman can make her own discretionary judgment on that matter.

Ruth Kelly rose—

Mr. Tyrie: I should like the Financial Secretary to answer the point that has been made, instead of trying to interrupt, because hundreds of thousands of people want her to make an intelligent reply.

8.49 pm

Ruth Kelly: We have had an interesting debate with some passionate contributions on each side of the House, including from my hon. Friends the Members for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) and for West Bromwich,

[Ruth Kelly]

West (Mr. Bailey). Before responding to the debate, I should make it clear to the House that I have not presented my findings or the Government's findings, much as some hon. Members have tried to insinuate that that is the case; I have presented Lord Penrose's account. Tonight, I have found that the real position of the Liberal Democrats is that Lord Penrose's report is unsatisfactory, and that the position of the official Opposition is to try to attribute to Lord Penrose a view that he does not hold. I shall shortly deal with each point raised by the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin).

First, I must dispel some myths that have been raised during the debate. Lord Penrose is absolutely clear that it was not the guaranteed annuity problem that led to the society's financial crisis in 2001. He says that, superficially, a £1.5 billion additional liability

"should not have brought down a society" with funds of £32 billion. The issues that he identifies are deep-rooted and go back 30 years into the history of the society. He says that, primarily,

"the Society was author of its own misfortunes."

Hon. Members in all parts of the House are agreed with Lord Penrose that, with hindsight, it was "the system that failed to provide the regulation that changing circumstances . . . required, not that there was failure to implement what was fundamentally a satisfactory system."

Nevertheless, I believe that the House should reflect carefully on the fact that that was the system that Ministers and Parliament had intended.

The difference between the two sides of the House tonight arises on whether there was operational failure that led to economic loss by policyholders. Lord Penrose has not presented in his report evidence of operational failure. I quote:

"The deficiencies are not so obvious as some are inclined (or wish) to believe . . . and it is not enough in this case, to infer from the coincidence of systems deficiencies and loss that one caused or contributed to the other."

He stresses that he examines the regulators with the benefit of hindsight and that they were operating under a system that was different in approach, resources and values from that which applies today. I think that the House should reflect carefully on the fact that it is a question of the laws that Parliament enacted and the context in which Ministers resolved how those laws should be implemented that Lord Penrose criticises, rather than the discrete actions of the regulator.

Let me deal with the points raised by the right hon. Member for West Dorset. First, he tried to insinuate that because the level of skills needed to be upgraded after the FSA was instituted, that was itself a sign of operational failure. However, if he had done his homework and read the report more fully, he would have read Lord Penrose's view of that issue. I quote from chapter 13:

"Ministers resolved . . . that scrutiny would continue to be based on the examination of the regulatory returns, and that action on the basis of policyholders' reasonable expectations would be reactive to what was found in the returns so as to restrict the workload that a less restrained approach would involve."

It was that which led deliberately to the under-resourcing of the DTI. Lord Penrose goes on to make the link by stating that the DTI was

"ill-equipped to participate in the regulatory process. It had inadequate staff, and those involved at line supervisor level in particular were not qualified to make any significant contribution to the process."

Lord Penrose himself is clear that that was not operational failure but a deliberate decision taken by managers, and when he was asked in the Select Committee on the Treasury about systemic failure, he said that those issues were aspects of the same problem. He is absolutely clear about that point.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Ruth Kelly: If the hon. Gentleman listened, he might hear the quotes from the Penrose report. I must put the points on the record before the end of the debate.

The right hon. Member for West Dorset referred to chapter 19 and paragraph 187, which is about subordinated debt. If he read the Penrose report more closely, he would see that Lord Penrose says of that episode:

"The authorisation was within the scope of the relevant regulations and guidance. I do not criticise any of the formal steps taken or the propriety of the order granted."

The right hon. Gentleman went on to refer to paragraph 117, which is about the failure to appreciate a change of valuation assumptions in the regulatory returns. The practice adopted between 1990 and 1997 by Equitable Life of using different interest rates for valuing its assets and liabilities was within the regulations of the time. As they were within the regulations, regulators had no grounds to challenge the decision—again, there was no evidence of operational failure.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ruth Kelly: No, I must make my points before the end of the debate.

The right hon. Member for West Dorset cited paragraphs 240 and 228 of chapter 19 about the general failure by regulators to follow up issues and the ineffectiveness of challenge. Again, we can trace Lord Penrose's comments back to under-resourcing—a decision was deliberately taken by Ministers in the DTI to restrict the work load that a less restrained approach would involve. As Lord Penrose says, individual regulators "operated in good faith and to the best of their abilities within the system as they found it".

The right hon. Gentleman also cited paragraph 209 of chapter 19 about the information obtained, which was not used to form a realistic appraisal of the society's financial position. Had he looked back a couple of paragraphs he would have found that Lord Penrose deliberately makes a link to the Government's success in watering down the third life directive and the fact that a paper-based approach remained in place. He said that that approach had "other consequences" and made a link to the episode. Again, it was a policy decision, not an operational failure.

Many hon. Members have raised the question of the ombudsman's remit and her inquiry. You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as will hon. Members, that the parliamentary ombudsman is an Officer of the House, who reports to it and is independent of the Executive and Government. That is an important principle that all hon. Members should abide by. In her initial investigations, the ombudsman chose to examine the FSA's period of stewardship. She could have chosen to examine a different period, but did not. She chose to look at one lead case. She could have chosen a different case, but did not do so. She concluded that there was no case for the Government to answer, and that there was no maladministration that led to loss. The fact that hon. Members do not agree with her conclusion does not mean that they should reject it.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ruth Kelly: No, I have two minutes left, and the right hon. Gentleman must let me make my point.

We are determined to protect policyholders. Lord Penrose says that the FSA reforms "represent a major comprehensive re-assessment of the requirements of an efficient regulatory system".

We are determined not to be complacent. There will be a programme of comprehensive reviews—a review of corporate governance of life mutuals will be led by Sir Derek Morris; a review of actuarial standards of performance will be led by Paul Myners; and a review of accounting standards will be led by the independent Accounting Standards Board. That work, alongside the FSA reforms welcomed by Lord Penrose, will develop the architecture of the life assurance industry for present and future policyholders, and will help to ensure that the regulatory system remains up to date.

We have also pledged to consult shortly on legislation that will protect policyholders from unlimited liability—an issue raised in the Penrose report that we are determined to address. I have also spoken to the financial ombudsman to see whether he needs any additional resources or help from the Government to deal with any consequential claims that may, or may not, arise from Lord Penrose's report. We have learned the lessons—

It being Three hours after the commencement of proceedings, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put, pursuant to Order [17 March].

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

FEES AND CHARGES

That the draft Police Act 1997 (Criminal Records) (Fees) Order 2004, which was laid before this House on 23rd February, be approved.—[Margaret Moran.]

Question agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Ordered,

That Mrs Cheryl Gillan be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mrs Angela Browning be added.—[Margaret Moran.]

PETITION

Quiggins, Liverpool

8.59 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): If you have never had the opportunity to visit Liverpool, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I suggest you try and get to see us as soon as possible. Liverpool is a great city of kind-hearted, spirited people. We have marvellous museums, theatres and buildings that rival anything in the UK. After years of underinvestment, since 1997 Labour Government money has been helping to transform our city. In 2002 our glorious city received the ultimate accolade when it was awarded the status of European city of culture 2008.

What a wonderful array of goodies we have to offer our visitors, including Quiggins, a marvellous retail mix with something for everyone. Motorbikes, antique furniture and the best 60s clothes on the planet are all available in this retail unit. But Quiggins is facing compulsory purchase as the mega Grosvenor empire seeks to close one of the best shopping experiences that Liverpool offers.

I present to the House tonight a petition signed by 50,000 people, which includes the names of thousands of my constituents who are both customers and retailers of that lovely emporium. I ask the House to urge the Deputy Prime Minister to consider carefully the recommendations placed before him by the planning inspectorate, to support the retention of a great Liverpool institution and to support Quiggins.

To lie upon the Table.

Participation in Elections

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Margaret Moran.]

9.1 pm

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside): In the 2001 general election, voter turnout dropped to its lowest level since the advent of universal suffrage: just over half of those eligible to vote did so. There has been much discussion about low turnout and declining participation in elections. I am sure it is an issue that concerns us all. We speak and seek to govern for the majority, but we are fast approaching a situation in which the majority may not bother to vote at all.

The last general election saw a turnout of some 59.4 per cent.—a new record low, surpassing the previous low of 71.3 per cent. achieved in 1997. In local elections, particularly in local by-elections, we can only dream of such turnouts, as actual turnouts often average less than 40 per cent. In local authority by-elections, participation levels that were once unheard of, between 10 and 15 per cent., are pretty much run of the mill. The predictions for the future are that this trend of decline is set to continue, with pitiful turnouts predicted for the forthcoming European elections, which might be saved only by the fact that they are being held on the same day as the local elections, and probably a new low in the next general election.

We may well look back to the 1997 election, when 30 per cent. of the electorate did not vote, as some kind of golden age. That is a sad indictment of our current system, as we seem content that such a large proportion of our electorate did not take part in the process. We also seem content that a large and growing number of people do not even register in the first place. No doubt many hon. Members have looked at the electoral registers, as I have done, and seen examples of properties that we know are occupied, but which do not appear on the register. Some colleagues have seen quite sizeable drops in their electorate.

We require individuals by law to fill out registration forms and give correct information, yet we appear to do nothing about it if they do not. Arguably, we have never recovered from the effects of the poll tax and the huge numbers of people, particularly younger people, who left the register in an attempt to avoid the tax. A cynic might argue that that was one of the main aims of that Conservative policy.

What are we doing to encourage registration? Not a lot, I would say. Yes, the Electoral Commission has had poster campaigns and some councils are more diligent than others, but the reality is that we are only scratching the surface. Furthermore, when I asked the Department for Constitutional Affairs for an estimate of the extent of the problems that we face and what is being done about them, I was told that in the main, it does not keep such information. Why not? Unless we know the extent of the problem, we will never tackle it effectively.

Our last experience of elections in Wales was the Assembly elections last year. My party and I were pleased with the result, but I do not think that anyone could, or indeed should, find the turnout acceptable. My own seat held the unenviable record of the lowest turnout in Wales, of some 24.9 per cent.—less than a quarter of the electorate.

Why was the turnout so poor? I am sure that we could all find reasons to explain away the lack of participation. In areas such as the north-east and the south-east of Wales, which voted against devolution in the first place, turnout was certainly lower than in the pro-devolution areas. Anglesey, Ynys Môn, had the highest turnout of just over 50 per cent., but still hardly a level that we can be pleased with.

The Assembly has an uphill battle to convince many people in the north that it is not just a Cardiff-based institution, and without doubt there is still a lack of understanding among the electorate as to exactly what its powers and responsibilities are. The method of election did not help, either, with a bizarre system of proportional representation that in many cases gave the losing candidates in the constituency election a seat in the Assembly through a back-door method of selection via the regional list.

In addition, there was the ludicrous situation of Clwyd, West, where the only candidate who stood a chance of not getting elected to the Assembly was the sitting Labour Member, as the Tory, Liberal Democrat and Plaid Cymru candidates were all No. 1 on their party lists, and barring some miracle were certain to be elected. Despite rejecting those three candidates at the ballot box, the voters of Clwyd, West—and, indeed, the rest of north Wales—find themselves supposedly represented by those individuals in the Assembly. Furthermore, despite the fact that people voted by a clear majority for Labour on the party list in north Wales, not a single Labour list member was elected. Apparently, that is democracy in action, but I think that most people find it rather difficult to understand—or, more to the point, to justify.

There are lessons that we can learn from the Assembly elections, but we would be making a grave mistake if we believed that simply addressing those factors would make a meaningful difference to turnout. The problem is that we look to explain away poor turnouts on an election-by-election basis, and do not look at the long-term trend, which is getting worse. We are in denial, and like anybody in denial we look for excuses rather than addressing the problem.

In the 1997 general election, turnout was apparently low because Tory voters stayed at home. In 2001 they apparently did it again, and many Labour voters thought it was a foregone conclusion, so they did not vote either. That may or may not be true, but it does nothing to address the problem that we face. Likewise, we find further comfort in blaming the press and the media for encouraging cynicism and complacency among the electorate.

We have all become used to the accusations—"They're all the same. It doesn't matter which lot get elected, because they won't change anything. It's hardly worth bothering. They're not interested in ordinary people. They can't relate to you, particularly if you're young, and they don't care about the old. They're only in it for themselves." Oh, and by the way, we all spend at least 95 per cent. of our time on holiday, as Nicky Campbell never tires of telling us on Radio 5. Again, with the press that we have, I cannot see that changing in the foreseeable future. We will not return to the reverence with which the media used to treat politicians in the 1950s, and we should not do so. We must live with that situation; we must get on with it.

We face a simple choice: either we accept the growing disengagement with the political process or we do something about it. The situation will not change by itself, and all the evidence points to its getting worse in the future. As individual politicians, we can only do so much. We can make ourselves more accessible, hold more surgeries, knock on more doors, consult more and listen more, but that does not necessarily mean that we can improve matters on our own. Because of their hard work and public standing, some hon. Members may be able to count on higher levels of personal support than others, which may enable them to hold their seats in difficult times and difficult elections for their parties. However, there is little evidence that individual politicians have any real impact on turnout itself—at least in a positive way.

Our attempts to improve turnout have therefore focused on changes to the mechanism of voting itself. Experiments with postal voting have, without doubt, proved successful, and I welcome the changes that have made postal voting easier. Where we have had all-out postal voting in local elections, there have been sharp increases in turnout, and I personally regret that we will not have postal votes in Wales this year. However, it will be some time before we can judge whether that is a short-term change in voting patterns or a significant breakthrough.

With postal voting, there is also concern among us, as politicians, that we will somehow lose control of the election process and that our traditional forms of campaigning must change. We would no doubt all have sleepless nights at the thought of voters filling out ballot papers and sending them off before we have had a chance to canvass them. However, would that not be a price worth paying if we could significantly improve participation in our elections?

I am further encouraged and drawn to postal voting by the opposition of the Conservative party—there must be something in it, if the Conservative party is against it. It therefore comes as little surprise that Conservatives in the other place are doing their best to derail our proposals.

Some would argue that all we must do is change the method of election from first past the post to some form of proportional representation, and suddenly large numbers of people would flock to polling stations and take part in the democratic process. Our experience in Wales, and indeed in Scotland, demonstrates that that is unlikely to be the case.

Arguments over voting systems have always tended to be carried out among academics rather than among people. I have never come across a dedicated non-voter who quotes the electoral system as their reason for not voting. Equally, reform of the other place, and some of our other hobby-horses in this House, are low down on their lists too. Ultimately, we must decide whether we are serious about increasing voter participation. If we are not, we must carry on as we are—perhaps we can tinker a bit here and there, with voting on Sundays, using the internet, voting at supermarkets and votes at 16, but we are still likely to see decline.

If we are serious about making a change, we must consider compulsion. To some, that would be an acceptance that we have failed in all other means of voter re-engagement—perhaps it would—and no doubt it will upset the liberal elite. However, are we really comfortable with a situation in which turnouts for future general elections may be less than 50 per cent, and perhaps in the long term even less than 40 per cent.? Are we really saying that it is too much to expect and require the citizens of this country to go out and vote once every four or five years to take part in the political process? Even if they choose ultimately to vote for "none of the above" and spoil their vote, is it such a great infringement of civil liberties? I think not.

Experience from around the world shows us that compulsory voting works, and is accepted by the citizens of countries where it operates. Voting is regarded not only as a right, but as a civic duty. For example, Australia has had compulsory voting for many years. There is a small fine for those who do not take part without a valid reason, but the numbers are not great. Nobody would argue that Australia is anything other than an open and democratic country, yet over the past 30 years it has consistently achieved turnouts of around 95 per cent. of the electorate. Australia's lowest turnout since 1972 was 94.2 per cent.—a level that we have never achieved, and will never achieve, unless we are prepared to change our present system.

America, on the other hand, illustrates the dangers of the direction in which we may be heading. Turnout in the congressional elections in 2002 was just 52 per cent. of the registered electorate; but when one looks at the percentage of voting age population—an estimate of those eligible to register to vote—the percentage drops to a staggering 36.5 per cent.

Requiring people to take part in the democratic process is not the thin end of the wedge of a totalitarian society—on the contrary, it engages people who would otherwise not take part in, and be ignored by, the political process. Importantly, it makes politicians and political parties seek to engage with the electorate as a whole, rather than only with those who vote. We need only look to America, where in certain states whole sections of the population are effectively disfranchised and ignored by the political parties. After all, why appeal, or have policies that appeal, to people who are not on the register and do not vote?

Even in this country, the employed are twice as likely to vote as the unemployed, the old more likely than the young, and the middle class more likely than the working class. There is a real danger that we in Britain could go down that road. We need seriously to explore and study the options surrounding compulsory voting, including incentive-based and penalty-based systems. The international evidence is there. We must find a reliable and workable solution to this long-term problem.

The Government rightly talk about the rights and responsibilities of our citizens. It is a right—a precious right—to be able to vote. In many countries, people are still fighting and dying in the pursuit of that right, yet many in this country simply cast it aside. With rights come responsibilities, and the time is now right for us to enshrine that responsibility in law.

9.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and

[Mr. Christopher Leslie]

Deeside (Mark Tami) on securing this opportunity to debate a vital issue that is essential to this Parliament—namely, the degree to which we secure participation in our democratic system and in our elections. All hon. Members accept as a top priority the fact that if we do not have good levels of participation, that reflects ill on the nature of our society. A civilised society is one that has active citizenship and where, if elected representatives are to act with a strong mandate and to be held accountable for their actions, as many citizens as possible must be active and participating.

As my hon. Friend notes, turnout and participation varies enormously in many different ways. It varies from area to area and in terms of ethnicity, social class, educational background, occupational background and age. No matter which way one cuts the cake, there are different lessons to learn about the extent to which people are willing to participate. Of course, we as politicians have a key role—perhaps it is a burden on us all—in stimulating debate, making politics more interesting and presenting a real choice to the electorate. When we near general election periods, we naturally find that there is more interest among the population as they feel that their choice is more obvious. We do not do too badly in Britain in that respect.

By coincidence—or perhaps not, if my hon. Friend has timed his request for this Adjournment debate very well—the Electoral Commission and the Hansard Society launched a joint audit of political engagement today in Portcullis House. In it, they looked at a whole series of influences among the general population. A survey was undertaken, and my hon. Friend will be delighted to learn that the audit demonstrated that, for example, people who have recently had contact with their local Member of Parliament are much more likely to be satisfied with their performance than those who have not—62 per cent. were satisfied, as against 38 per cent. who were not. That is a nice thing to note. In fact, the audit report comments that "familiarity with politicians... breeds favourability, not contempt."

That is something of which we can all be proud.

Among the good things in the audit was the finding that 41 per cent. of people were satisfied with their own Member of Parliament, while just 13 per cent. were dissatisfied. It also found that people view individual Members of Parliament more favourably than MPs as a collective, and that 74 per cent. agree that voting is a duty, while 75 per cent. said that they wanted to have a say in how the country was run. There were, however, less good aspects to the findings. Only 50 per cent. of people said that they were interested in politics, and less than half the public say that they are well informed about politics, in terms of both their perceived and assessed knowledge. So the audit presents a mixed picture. I pay tribute to the Hansard Society and the Electoral Commission for their work on it.

I think that my hon. Friend would be the first to acknowledge that first-time voters are especially important in ensuring that we maintain the momentum in democratic participation. Research has shown that those who vote at the first opportunity tend to continue to participate on later occasions. Conversely, those who do not bother see no reason to change that habit, and tend to stay away from the ballot box on a more permanent basis.

Our approach has therefore been to attack this issue in a number of different ways, not least through schools. Citizenship education is just one of the mechanisms for raising awareness and educating people about how decisions are made, who makes them, why decision makers make their decisions and how they can be influenced. In England, we already have a good level of compulsory citizenship education for 11 to 14-year-olds. That has been the case since Sept 2002. There is no statutory curriculum in Scotland, but I understand that the Scottish Executive have produced guidance to ensure that the breadth of the curriculum includes social and democratic responsibilities. In Wales, my hon. Friend will know that citizenship education forms part of the personal and social education framework that was implemented in September 2000. In regard to Northern Ireland, I understand that our ministerial colleagues are considering their own proposals for citizenship education.

Other useful initiatives have taken place in recent years. The creation of the Electoral Commission has been useful, as it has helped to lead and innovate in participatory democracy policy. It was set up in November 2000, and its remit includes voter education as well as keeping electoral law and processes under review. It also develops publicity and awareness materials, and there have been television advertisements to encourage registration in elections. The commission's innovations are constantly being proposed, and it is quite prodigious in producing reports, to which we are keen to respond as best we can.

There are other ways in which we can improve participation. Technically and administratively, through the mechanics of the electoral system, we can remove barriers to participation and we are trying to take action in many different ways in that regard. My hon. Friend mentioned the electoral registration process, and we have had a great deal more accuracy recently in that regard, although when certain population changes have come into play, they have made it appear as though the registers have shrunk in some areas. Obviously, such changes will always have an effect on the quantum of the register, but we now have increasingly accurate electoral registers. They are locally administered, and rightly so.

We also have new help for voters with disabilities. We are piloting electronic voting, and telephone voting has been piloted in local elections. There has also been postal voting on demand in the ordinary run of elections. Earlier today we debated yet again our attempt to achieve piloting of all-postal voting, which we know for a fact has a positive effect on turnout in general—there tends to be a considerable increase. Depending on the passage of that legislation, we hope that as many regions as possible of the four that we have identified can benefit from that.

My hon. Friend referred specifically to the experience in his locality of the 2003 Welsh Assembly elections. I know that the turnout, which was only 38 per cent., disappointed him and other colleagues. That is obviously a challenge, predominantly for the Welsh Assembly, and many of the remedies rest in its own hands. However, the Electoral Commission usefully published an official report commenting on turnout. While it says that this is not wholly a Welsh issue, it highlights specific areas in which it may be able to undertake extra activity. For example, it feels that there was an information deficit on the nature of the Welsh Assembly. Clearly, that is a matter for the Assembly to address.

The Electoral Commission feels that voters had particular views on the Welsh Assembly that did not necessarily encourage them to turn out and vote. However, the Government support the current devolution settlement and we do not think that there is any particular evidence that changing the settlement at that level would affect public engagement. The Electoral Commission also says that the election campaign was too low key. All the political parties have a role to play in ensuring that we pep things up a little to make the campaign more interesting for all concerned.

As usual, enthusiasm among younger voters was at a relatively low level, but the citizenship efforts being undertaken by the Welsh Assembly Government will help with that. In Wales, particularly for the Assembly elections, there may also be a need for more convenient voting methods. I assure my hon. Friend that we will discuss with the Welsh Assembly Government whether any powers are needed to enable innovation in voting mechanisms for Welsh Assembly elections. I hope that he will monitor that and keep a close eye on developments.

My hon. Friend also concludes that it is perhaps time that we started to consider the age-old question of compulsion—compulsory voting and whether the attraction of being able to remove at a stroke worries about turnout should come upon us. I see aspects of the attraction, but, as he knows—I read the Fabian Society pamphlet he wrote some time ago with a colleague of ours—there are disadvantages. I would worry about the sense of the voting process being criminalised. If people did not attend the polling station, would they be behaving in a criminal manner? That would be a big step for us to take in our civilised society. There are serious issues that need considering.

Turnout, of course, involves more than attendance at the polling station. Political disengagement is the deeper problem and failure to turn out is merely a symptom of it. As one of my officials helpfully pointed out when we were talking about the debate, "You can force school children to do cross-country running, but you cannot make them enjoy it." I do not think that compulsory voting would necessarily force everybody to engage with the political process. It is not wholly a solution. Of course, enforcing the process of compulsory voting would also be a mammoth task, and perhaps disproportionate to the nature of the offence. Therefore, while I hear what my hon. Friend says, some potential disadvantages would need to be overcome.

Nevertheless, I do not want to rain on my hon. Friend's parade completely. In 1998, the Home Affairs Committee reported that while compulsory voting might not be desirable, there should be a public debate on it. I gather that the Electoral Commission has said subsequently that it wants to examine the issue in more detail, and it may well be researching some of the wider international experience. He should therefore watch that space. In the meantime, however, I am afraid that the Government have no plans to pursue the possibility of compulsory voting.

Parliament is sensitive to the need to act to improve participation in the electoral process, however. As a Government, we have taken significant steps forward, and are working hard to take further steps. The more fundamental question is how we as politicians can enthuse the public and engage their interest further to make that political process work, but I at least congratulate my hon. Friend on raising the subject today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Nine o'clock.

Fisheries: Catch Quotas and Effort Limitation 2004

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 15388/03, draft Regulation fixing for 2004 the fishing opportunities and associated conditions for certain fish stocks and groups of fish stocks, applicable in Community waters and, for Community vessels, in waters where catch limitations are required; and notes that the Government was successful in negotiating Total Allowance Catches which take full account of scientific advice while securing the best possible fishing opportunities for United Kingdom fishermen.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Broadband

1. Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): What steps are being taken to increase the take-up rates of broadband in the UK. [163433]

7. Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): What steps she is taking to increase the availability of broadband in rural areas. [163439]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): We are making good progress towards ensuring that the UK has the most extensive and competitive broadband market in the G7 by 2005. Work across Government through the regional development agencies, local authorities, industry and community groups means that broadband is now available to more than 85 per cent. of homes and businesses, and use by small and medium-sized enterprises has doubled in the past 12 months. The joint Department of Trade and Industry/Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs rural broadband unit is working to ensure a specific focus on the needs of rural areas.

Mr. Cameron: Does the Minister agree that access to broadband is vital for our rural communities? Will she join me in congratulating British Telecom on setting trigger levels for all areas throughout Oxfordshire; and more to the point, will she congratulate local campaigners—heroes and heroines in our communities—who have campaigned to meet those trigger levels? Does the Minister accept, though, that in rural areas like mine, there are still many farms, businesses and sometimes whole hamlets that will not get broadband because they are too far from the exchange? Will she work with the development agencies and others to learn from the best practice round the country, and make sure that the Government lead the process of finding good solutions to make broadband available to all who currently cannot get it?

Jacqui Smith: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman. Of course it is important that we maximise the number of exchanges that are enabled, but BT's ADSL technology is not the only solution, particularly—as the hon. Gentleman points out—for communities that want broadband services and are more remote from those exchanges. That is why I commend, for example, the activity of the Oxford rural broadband project funded with a grant from the South East England Development Agency and from Europe. That provides a good example in the hon. Gentleman's constituency of how community organisations can take the lead in partnership with RDAs, local authorities and, in this case, the co-operative movement, to make sure the benefits are shared more broadly. I know that he has also welcomed that initiative.

Mr. Djanogly: By the end of this summer all the exchanges in my constituency should be enabled, which is good news. As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) described, people who live more than 6 km away from an exchange will probably not be able to receive a broadband service. The Minister gave an example of a community getting together in rural Oxfordshire. However, I shall be interested to hear what the Government intend to do to ensure that access is available to people living in remoter rural areas, such as my constituency. Have the Government ascertained the extent of the problem in terms of numbers?

Jacqui Smith: It was Government investment in the regional development agencies that enabled the action in the constituency of the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), and through the East of England Development Agency in the hon. Gentleman's constituency as well—a £30 million investment that has led, for example, to a £3.8 million connecting communities project which impacts on the hon. Gentleman's constituency, an awareness campaign, confirmation from BT that the take-up of broadband services in the eastern region is the highest in the UK, and funding for technology trials so that, for example, the interestingly named Rabbit project across rural parts of the region is ensuring that those which previously had no hope of broadband connection by any other means are having the technology trialled. This is, of course, funding from the Government through regional development agencies—funding and agencies that Conservative Members opposed.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): The Government should be commended for the work they have done on broadband, and it would be churlish to blame them for the fact that the technology has not yet reached remoter areas. However, in the rural areas of Scotland—the highlands and islands—there is a genuine problem of access to the service for businesses. Will my right hon. Friend look into that and consider subsidies for such areas for broadband and telecommunications in general?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. As I outlined, it is the considerable additional investment being made available through the devolved Administrations as well as the development agencies that is enabling other technology—wireless technology and the development of other means of connecting businesses and homes to broadband—which allows us to make such progress. I share my hon. Friend's concern. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services has outlined, we will do all we can in Government to ensure that we meet the target of having the most extensive and competitive broadband market, and of access in every community to the benefits that broadband can bring to households, communities and businesses.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): The Minister knows that the UN-affiliated International Telecommunication Union ranks the UK only 25th in digital take-up. Will she accept that that is because, even where broadband is available, the digital speeds offered by some so-called broadband packages are so slow that they have disappointed users, particularly businesses seeking to improve their productivity? The Government's definition of "broadband" is deliberately wider than it should be. Will the Minister adopt the ITU definition of broadband, or is she a victim of the Government's habit of relying on a looser, easier definition to try to meet their self-proclaimed targets—she used the word "target" earlier?

Jacqui Smith: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman feels it necessary to talk down the considerable progress in developing both availability and take-up of broadband, which has been achieved in partnership with regional development agencies, local authorities and devolved Administrations. Take-up has more than tripled because of Government action, and although the hon. Gentleman can bicker about definitions, the progress is obvious. The progress would be undermined by Opposition policies not only to cut investment, but to do away with RDAs, which have contributed so much.

Doha Trade Round

2. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What recent discussions she has had with other countries' Trade Ministers about the Doha trade round. [163434]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Since the ministerial meeting in Cancun last September, I have met or spoken to a wide variety of Trade Ministers about how we can more forward on the Doha round, including Commissioner Lamy, colleagues in other European Union member states, Minister Amorim from Brazil, Minister Erwin from South Africa, Minister Jaitley from India and Minister Zhang from China.

Hugh Bayley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one way to restart the stalled World Trade Organisation negotiations on trade and agriculture would be to revive the proposal to eliminate export subsidies? Our Government have made that proposal on many occasions, and even President Chirac of France floated it when he held his Africa summit one year ago. Might that not provide a way to put energy back into the talks and get people moving towards agreement once again?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The point is enormously important because part of the European Commission's negotiating mandate, which we helped to construct, is an offer to end export subsidies on all products of interest to developing countries, which have not started negotiations. I have recently written to Trade Ministers in a number of developing countries, and reinforced the point in discussion, to say that the offer is not a negotiating trick from the European Commission. If those developing countries produce a list of products on which they want an end to export subsidies, it will be negotiated. I am delighted that Agriculture Commissioner Fischler said in public on Monday that it is up to developing countries to say which products they are interested in, and that if they say "all products", we must discuss that too. That is how to abolish those appalling export subsidies, which are so damaging to developing countries.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): In their response to the Select Committee report on Cancun, the Government said:

> "We agree the EU needs to work harder to explain to many countries the longer term impact of the CAP reforms agreed last year".

Is it the Secretary of State's view that the European Union has done enough on agriculture and common agricultural policy reform, and that it is simply a matter for others—notably, the United States—to reform; or do the Government take the view that there is more work to be done in the EU on CAP reform if we are to have a successful development round?

Ms Hewitt: Much has been done since December, when the European Union agreed its position post-Cancun. I welcome the fact that Commissioner Lamy has gone to so many countries and talked to so many Trade Ministers around the world to set out in detail the implications of the CAP reform package that we agreed last year, and the offer on export subsidies to which I have just referred. There is, however, more to do. I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in those issues, and he will know that we are already engaged in discussions within the Agriculture Council on further reforms on cotton and, in particular, sugar, which are crucial to developing countries and which must form part not only of Europe's reform programme, but of a successful conclusion to the Doha round.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the stalling of the Doha agenda has led not only to problems for developing countries, but to a number of countries entering into free trade agreements, almost as an expression of frustration? Last week, when I was in south-east Asia with my colleagues on the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, we visited Malaysia, Thailand and Singapore, which have entered into such agreements. There is a worry that the EU's trade agenda is being lost in respect of such countries. Moreover, there is a danger that the bigger Europe created by the accession process will have a "fortress Europe" tendency that ignores certain countries that are not developing countries, but mature economies from which we could benefit a great deal through improved trade relations.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes a series of extremely important points. I pay tribute to his work on this issue as Chairman of the Select Committee. I told the House in the wake of Cancun that there was a real danger of bilateral agreements taking the place of making the right efforts on the Doha round. That has happened to some extent, although not as much as many of us feared. In reality, it is only through the World Trade Organisation that we can deal with some of the most difficult issues, including agriculture, which was exempted from the recent free trade agreement between the United States and Australia because they simply could not reach agreement on it.

I welcome the fact that Commissioner Lamy is focusing his efforts on reviving the Doha round. That will be difficult, but I share the view expressed by Commissioner Lamy, Ambassador Zoellick and several Ministers in developing countries—that we can move the talks forward and agree by July the framework that we should ideally have reached at Cancun last September.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): I congratulate the Secretary of State on her recent robust Mansion House speech in which she warned of the dangers of US protectionism.In the spirit of her remarks about the Doha round, will she do more to end the intransigence over cotton that is having such severe consequences in west Africa? Will she press for greater flexibility on, or indeed the abandonment of, the Singapore conditions, which are causing great concern among G77 countries? On agriculture, will she insist that, in ensuring that the United States and Europe have viable farming economies, we do not do so at the expense of destroying the livelihoods of subsistence farmers in developing countries through unfair and devastating export subsidies?

Ms Hewitt: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and thank him for his opening comments. On cotton, we are in the process of negotiating with our European partners a significant decoupling of income support to farmers from production subsidies. That will make a great difference. However, I share the hon. Gentleman's view that the real challenge is to the United States, which has enormous cotton subsidies. More generally, if the European Union is to deliver its share of the phasing out of export subsidies, the United States, too, must deal with the food aid and export credits that fulfil the same damaging purpose.

I made it plain last year that the Singapore conditions were not UK priorities, but I welcome the fact that the European Commission wants to decouple the four issues. There is general agreement that we should proceed with discussions on trade facilitation, and some, but a little less, agreement on transparency in Government procurement, investment and competition. My view is that those matters should be put to one side for the moment while we get on with the really important issues in this round.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I have received letters from constituents who are worried that one result of the trade talks will be that developing countries have to privatise water services. The Government deny that, but non-governmental organisations keep campaigning on it. Can my right hon. Friend tell the House whether informal pressure on developing countries is making them privatise water to the detriment of poor people? Will she support any developing country that is under pressure to do that but does not want to?

Ms Hewitt: I have repeatedly tried to make it clear in this House, and in correspondence with my hon. Friend and other hon. Members, that there is nothing whatever in the general agreement on trade in services—GATS—that would require any country to privatise its water industry or anything else. The same non-governmental organisations that make that accusation also say that GATS would require the privatisation of the national health service, which is also nonsense. When we speak to Ministers in developing countries, we hear that they welcome the opportunity that GATS gives, because it gives them the power to decide which sectors to open up and which not to open up.

The reality is that in some developing countries, it is the judgment of their Government that the only way to get the massive investment that they need to provide clean, affordable water and decent sanitation is to bring in private capital. That is a judgment for those countries to make, not for us and, frankly, not for the NGOs. Our advice to developing countries, however, is that if they seek to open up water industries in that way, they need a strong framework of regulation to make sure that they protect affordable water for their poorest communities. We stand ready to assist with that process, particularly through the Department for International Development.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that there is nothing more important for lifting poorer countries out of poverty than a successful conclusion of the Doha round? Does she agree that it is not just the elimination of export subsidies in the developed world that is important for that, but the elimination of domestic subsidies, and that while free trade is important for rich countries, it is often a matter of life and death for poorer countries? What prospect does she see of completing the development round, a very important round indeed, by the target date of 1 January next year?

Ms Hewitt: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's support for all our efforts to get the round and the negotiations back on track. The potential gains for developing countries are enormous. An ambitious round could boost the incomes of developing countries alone by some £150 billion, dwarfing the amount that they receive in aid and bringing hundreds of millions of people out of abject poverty. The prize is enormous.

This of course requires progress not only on agriculture but on market opening and the tariff escalation that prevents developing countries from moving into much higher value-added production. It also requires the larger developing countries to open their markets to the smaller developing countries—in the way, to be fair, the European Union has done for the least developed countries with the "Everything but Arms" agreement. The timetable has clearly slipped, and the crucial issue now is to agree, I hope by July—before the United States moves into its election campaign—a framework for the round so that we can make the necessary progress to move forward to completion next year. Our Government, holding both the presidency of the G8 and the presidency of the European Union next year, will make that a very high priority.

North Sea Drilling

3. Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): If she will make a statement on her Department's initiatives to stimulate levels of North sea exploration drilling. [163435]

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): We have taken a number of important steps to help, including introducing new types of licence to increase exploration levels, and increasing the data available to the industry. Through PILOT, the Government/industry oil and gas forum, we have been working to ensure activity in previously fallow areas, and we are making good progress on that. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is introducing an exploration expenditure supplement to stimulate exploration by new entrants to the North sea.

Miss Begg: I welcome the announcement in last week's Budget on encouraging exploration, but I am sure that my hon. Friend is well aware that there is nervousness in the North sea area that there is not enough exploration. If exploration does not happen, either on known reserves or to find new reserves, the future of the oil and gas industry in the North sea will not be as rosy as we all hope. Will my hon. Friend make sure that the Government, either through the Treasury or through his Department, do everything that they can to ensure that extra exploration is encouraged, whether through the exchanging of licences or changing the nature of licences, to make sure that new entrants and existing operators have the chance to explore as much as they can?

Mr. Timms: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend, and as she knows, there could easily still be as much oil and gas in the North sea as we have extracted in the past few decades. It is essential that we fully exploit those resources not only to benefit her constituents, but to benefit the economy as a whole. We are working very hard in that regard and there are some very encouraging signs. However, I am aware of the concerns that exist in the industry, and I met the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association recently to discuss them.

My hon. Friend may have seen this morning's report by 3i, which shows sharply increased asset disposals from the big oil companies that create major new opportunities for drilling. That is expected to make a very important contribution over the next few years. Moreover, my Department's latest survey of drilling intentions, which was also published today, shows that drilling expectations for the coming year are 30 per cent. higher than a year ago. So there are encouraging signs, but I agree with my hon. Friend that we need to work very hard with the industry to make sure that those positive signs become full grown.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Do the figures for drilling intentions relate to development drilling—the expanding of existing reserves—or to the new frontier exploration that will unlock the other half of the oil reserves that the Minister says we have yet to extract? There is real nervousness in the north-east of Scotland because, despite a long and sustained run of high oil prices, we are still not seeing the activity that we would expect. We urge the Government to look again at how to incentivise the exploration that would unlock the key to those reserves.

Mr. Timms: Again, I agree that this issue is important, and the figures that I gave cover drilling of all kinds. The hon. Gentleman will doubtless have heard the announcement concerning the frontier licence in the current 22nd offshore round, which will encourage drilling in areas west of Shetland in particular. It is a long time since there has been much exploration in those areas, and we certainly want to see more.

On fiscal incentives, I should point out to the hon. Gentleman that the Treasury works very closely with us through PILOT, the oil and gas industry taskforce, and that there have been big improvements, such as the abolition of royalties and the ending of petroleum revenue tax on new third-party tariff business relating to pipelines and other infrastructure. However, all these matters will be kept closely under review.

Spin-out Companies

4. Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): How many jobs have been created by spin-out companies from universities in the last five years. [163436]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have overseen a huge cultural change in the attitude of our universities towards business in the past five years. In 2001–02 alone, 213 spin-out companies from universities created a total of more than 12,000 jobs, compared with an average of 70 a year in the first half of the 1990s. The steps that we have taken to encourage universities to commercialise good ideas have contributed directly to this record.

Mrs. Campbell: There are many successful spin-out companies in Cambridge, such as Astex Technology, which is involved in discovering novel cancer drugs, so it is not just jobs that are being created but real opportunities. But how does my right hon. Friend intend to ensure that Government investment in the UK's science and research base will be maintained in the long term and not fall prey to short-termism?

Ms Hewitt: I certainly congratulate Astex Technology and all the other companies in my hon. Friend's constituency that are doing such extraordinary work, particularly in the field of new medicines and bioscience. Through the 10-year framework for science and innovation that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I announced before last week's Budget, we will ensure that there is a stable and strong funding foundation for the basic science in which our country is a world leader, but which was so appallingly neglected—if I may say so—during the years in which the Conservatives were in power. We will couple that investment with a continuing increase in investment in innovation, to ensure that businesses exploit the wealth of ideas and technology coming from our wonderful universities.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): How many jobs and spin-out companies have been created by the Cambridge-MIT Institute, the joint venture of Cambridge university and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology which is costing the taxpayer £65 million? Will the right hon. Lady confirm the National Audit Office's finding that the money was allocated in breach of the Treasury's own rules? And will she further confirm that up to half that money—British taxpayers' money—is being given to MIT, which is an extremely well endowed American institution?

Ms Hewitt: The Cambridge-MIT partnership is a wonderful partnership between two world-class institutions, which we secured against a great deal of competition from universities all over the world that wanted the partnership for their countries. We won it not just for Cambridge, but for Britain, and that partnership is delivering benefits to universities and businesses throughout our country. The NAO report was generally favourable and positive about the partnership, and on the 29th there will be a hearing of the Public Accounts Committee on the subject. I do not have the figures to hand, but I will write to the hon. Gentleman about them.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we have made some steady progress, but that we cannot afford to rest on our laurels? We need an evaluation of how well each of our 123 universities is doing annually, to establish where the strengths and weaknesses lie and how we can spread best practice. Will the Secretary of State talk to people such as Professor Boucher, the vice-chancellor of the university of Sheffield, who is very concerned about what the Treasury did in last year's Finance Act, which is inhibiting spin-out companies and interesting innovative partnerships?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the need to maintain progress and ensure that all universities, whether research intensive or not, are contributing to improving the economic performance of the regions and the country as a whole. I am aware of concerns about schedule 22 of the Finance Act 2003, and I am happy to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the universities and the Inland Revenue have discussed the problem; and that the Inland Revenue has been able to agree on a model for a standard spin-out company that will provide the certainty about the tax position that the universities are quite properly looking for.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Will the right hon. Lady join me in commending the remarkable work carried out at the university of Kent in the bio-sciences and medicine—in respect of both spin-out companies and established majors such as Pfizer's? Indeed, two young scientists were at the display exhibited in the House a fortnight ago. Does the Secretary of State agree that her Cabinet colleagues should reflect carefully on that before they decide on whether to grant Canterbury university's application for a medical school, currently under consideration?

Ms Hewitt: I am sure that the university and the companies to which the hon. Gentleman refers are doing wonderful work, and I shall certainly draw his point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in welcoming the recent announcement in the Budget that the Department of Health will in future ensure that its significant R and D budget for health developments will be used in a way that not only maximises the benefits to patients of new medicines, but increases the chances of getting new innovative and successful companies here in Britain to produce those new medicines.

Fair Trade (Belize)

5. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): What action her Department is taking in relation to the objectives of the Fairtrade movement, with particular reference to Belize. [163437]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The Government are committed to supporting the objectives of the Fairtrade movement. Fairtrade fortnight was a great success. Some 6,000 events took place across the UK raising awareness of the issue. In broader terms, the Government have provided £500,000 to assist the Fairtrade objectives.

As to Belize, the Government have provided £225,000 to support cocoa farmers from the Toledo region, one of the poorest areas of the country. It has enabled the Toledo cocoa growers association to expand the production of its cocoa products and increase its exports overseas.

Mr. Dalyell: Deeply impressed as I have been by inaugural meetings of small groups such as the one in the Linlithgow borough or larger groups such as the one at the university of Edinburgh, I still want to ask what the Department of Trade and Industry can do to enlarge the Fairtrade market. I am grateful to the Minister for what he said about Belize.

Mr. O'Brien: Fairtrade is an enormously important way of enabling disadvantaged producer groups in developing countries to receive a minimum price above that offered by mainstream markets. The price includes a premium to be used for community development projects. We have been trying to work with the Fairtrade movement to increase awareness of the benefits that that brings. Stimulating awareness of the wider problems is also important.

We can welcome the fact that Fairtrade coffee producers have about 8 per cent. of the market; but frankly, if we really want to resolve the trading problems of developing countries, the Doha development agenda is crucial. Fairtrade is an important initiative: we strongly support it and have invested some resources in it, but the most effective way of helping developing countries must be through the World Trade Organisation and proper international agreements.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Is Belize one of the countries covered by the extraordinary suggestion by the European Trade Commissioner that import controls should be imposed on countries that he says have different cultural values? When such nonsensical protectionist stuff comes out of the European Commission, why do the Government not condemn it?

Mr. O'Brien: We have always made it clear that we want markets to be open and fair. Throughout the WTO process and the Doha development agenda, Pascal Lamy has always made it clear that the aim is to achieve an agreement that progressively opens markets, encourages trade and lifts people out poverty. Both he and the British Government have made it very clear that we will promote those open markets.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that there is widespread public support for the Government's policy in respect of Doha, but he will recognise also that Belize and many other countries benefit from fair trade. Should we not congratulate the co-operative movement, which has played such a key part in this country in promoting Fairtrade products?

Mr. O'Brien: I entirely agree. We welcome the Co-op's recently announced initiative to double the size of its range of Fairtrade products by the end of 2004. That is a great initiative, and the Co-op is leading the way. We hope that other supermarket chains and businesses will follow suit.

Renewable Energy

6. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): If she will make a statement on the level of transmission access charges levied on renewable energy providers in the north of Scotland. [163438]

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): Scottish and Southern Energy currently levies charges for all generators to access the transmission system, through its subsidiary Scottish Hydro-Electricity Transmission Ltd. The new BETTA arrangements in the Energy Bill will create a Great Britain-wide market, in which transmission charges will be the responsibility of the National Grid Company.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer, and commend him for some of the Government amendments to the Energy Bill in the other place. They will clip Ofgem's wings in respect of charging for transmission and access, and that is very welcome. What assessment has he made of the proposals by many members of the Scottish renewables forum that access charges should be capped instead of being subject to a rebate system? Does he agree that that would have the benefit of being much simpler and much less bureaucratic?

Mr. Timms: I agree that there is huge opportunity for renewable energy in the north of Scotland and the highlands and islands, and I have also been very impressed by the very strong public support for it. Our clear view is that we should not put that potential at risk with a charging scheme that would make electricity generation uneconomic, or which would threaten it. That is why we have tabled the amendments to the Energy Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The scheme sets a threshold, above which we will be able to apply a discount. That leaves open the possibility that a cap could be imposed if there is a 100 per cent. discount on the portion above the threshold. However, that will depend on the analysis that we will carry out to determine what is needed to ensure that we retain and realise the potential offered by the north of Scotland.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East) (Lab): Given the importance that the Government attach to renewable energy, does my hon. Friend agree that we need to spend a lot more on research and development to meet our targets in the future? Recently, Sir David King has floated the idea of establishing a UK research centre to demonstrate our strong commitment to renewables in the future. Does he agree with that?

Mr. Timms: I agree very much with my hon. Friend about the importance of R and D in achieving our targets. We aim to get 10 per cent. of our electricity from renewable sources by 2010, and we want to double that by 2020. I am sure that my hon. Friend was encouraged, as was I, by what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in the Budget about the 10-year strategy and about public support for the centrality of science and innovation in the nation's economic strategy. I shall certainly be very keen to talk to Sir David King about his proposals, and my Department works very closely with the Government's chief scientist. However, there is no doubt that publicly supported R and D is one of the major keys to bringing about the changes that we need.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The Minister said that there were huge opportunities for renewable energy in the north of Scotland. Can he justify the Government's complete obsession with wind farms? They are a danger not only to birds, but to human health and the environment generally. Will he confirm that there is an estimated cost of £2 billion for each wind farm to enter into the grid and that the electricity cannot enter the grid and be transmitted without ghastly, dangerous, overhead lines?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Lady is wrong on a number of points. Certainly wind is currently the most cost effective of the renewable energy technologies available, so the current renewables obligation mechanism is bringing forward a welcome increase in wind energy capacity. However, we are also supporting the development of other technologies. It is important that every proposal should be put through a proper planning process, as each of them is. The hon. Lady will know that there is a serious threat to birds and wildlife generally from the development of climate change. We need to ensure that we change our energy economy to address that. That is why the World Wildlife Fund recently called on the Government to increase their targets for renewable energy.

Wind Turbine Farms

8. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What discussions she has held with other Government Departments concerning the allocation of sites for the development of offshore wind turbine farms. [163440]

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): The recent award of site leases for offshore wind farms was made by the Crown Estate working with the Department for Trade and Industry. The lease awards exercise closely involved other Departments, including the Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department for Transport.

Dr. Whitehead: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree about the importance of the development of offshore wind farms in ensuring that our renewable targets are achieved. Has he entered into a dialogue with the Ministry of Defence about its concerns about radar and wind turbines at sea? If so, is he willing to ask the Ministry of Defence for an open exchange of information so that those issues can be resolved, rather than the guessing game which appears to be going on now concerning whether MOD radar is a problem for offshore wind farms? Is he willing to resolve those issues speedily so that the developments can proceed?

Mr. Timms: I agree with my hon. Friend and welcome his strong support in this House and elsewhere for the development of renewable energy. I certainly am in dialogue with the MOD about its concerns, which I understand and which are proper. I agree that it is important that those concerns should be addressed and I am confident that they can be. This morning the MOD laid some objections to the offshore wind farms in round two. We shall certainly work closely with it to resolve those issues. I agree also with my hon. Friend's point about the need for openness so that everyone can see the way forward.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Against the background of the increasing resistance, of which I know the Minister is aware, by local communities, environmentalists, animal and bird welfare organisations and our armed forces to wind farms in some of our most treasured natural environments, both onshore and offshore where the Chamber of Shipping continues to raise serious concerns; and given the intermittent nature of wind-derived energy, however desirable as a renewable source but which will only ever be a relatively small contributory element to the United Kingdom's overall energy supplies, will the Minister who carries the ultimate responsibility for keeping the lights on now give an undertaking to the House that his Government's taxpayer-subsidised push for wind is not at the expense of the UK's medium to long-term safe, secure, competitively affordable mix of energy supplies from gas, oil and coal, or as the Minister has said, at the expense of ruling out new nuclear power?

Mr. Timms: The development of a substantial renewable energy generating sector will make an important contribution to security of supply. A diverse range of sources is needed and renewable electricity can only help.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): When the Minister considers the many offshore sites, will he encourage the applicants at Tween bridges in my constituency to move to an offshore site so that Thorne moors, a site of special scientific interest, will be not blighted by huge, ugly structures that work only 30 per cent. of the time?

Mr. Timms: I am aware of the concerns in my hon. Friend's area, which will be fully considered in the planning process. Development of onshore and offshore wind energy generating capacity is needed and there is clear evidence across the country of overwhelming public support for moving in that direction. We cannot go on burning more coal and oil; renewable energy is required as well.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Minister must recognise that not everybody loves those wretched, inefficient wind turbines. I prefer them offshore to onshore but when they are close to the coast, will the Minister ensure that discussions are held with local residents about the impact on tourism and water sports—and on birdlife? A Californian experiment showed that a considerable number of birds, including rare breeds, were dying. If a small part of the subsidy for wind energy were spent on energy conservation, more energy would be saved than is produced by the wretched wind turbines.

Mr. Timms: As I have said, there is strong public support throughout the country for the development of renewable energy. The recent round two offshore wind energy announcement included a coastal exclusion zone from 8 km to 13 km—particularly to protect birds, inshore fishing and other interests. A careful assessment will be made of every project's impact. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that wind power will make an important and substantial contribution to meeting the demand for electricity—not least in addressing the terrible problems and threats posed by climate change.

Coal Industry

9. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What steps she is taking to aid the United Kingdom coal industry. [163441]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): Since 2000, the Government have provided £165 million under the coal operating scheme and a further £54 million is available under the coal investment scheme, to access coal reserves and help safeguard and create jobs in mining areas. I thank my hon. Friend and other right hon. and hon. Members for helping the Government to compensate 366,000 sick miners, their widows and families. At a cost of £1.9 billion, that is probably the largest public compensation scheme in the world.

Paddy Tipping: The investment in compensation for former coal miners is extremely welcome—as is the £54 million of investment aid. Will the Minister act carefully when implementing the large combustion plant directive? A national plan approach could lead not to the coal industry's long-term sustainability but to its early demise.

Nigel Griffiths: The Government are working hard to ensure that decisions are in the best long-term interests of the economy. British collieries are among the most efficient in the world. I am aware of the concerns voiced by my hon. Friend and I know that the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services, my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), is meeting a number of colleagues and will listen carefully to their views.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): As the son of a former miner and someone who has lived in coal areas, I am concerned about the industry's future. The emissions trading scheme plans to reduce carbon dioxide but—as was said by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping)—the directive threatens not only the coal industry but coal-fired power stations. Does the Minister think that power stations can be helped to install flue gas desulphurisation, which will be needed for clean coal technology, or will coal have to be imported to survive in future? Or does the Minister see no future for the British coal industry?

Nigel Griffiths: Far from it. It is nice to hear words of sympathy for the coal industry from the Opposition, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman—I am sure that the House will know—that Drax, one of the largest and most efficient plants in Europe, is already utilising flue gas desulphurisation. So we have a proven track record in that area and my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services will this afternoon tell colleagues with genuine concerns on the issue about the steps that he intends to take to make further progress.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN AND EQUALITY

The Minister for Women and Equality was asked—

Pregnant Women (Discrimination)

21. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans she has to reduce discrimination against pregnant women in employment. [163453]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): Employers who discriminate against pregnant women are breaking the law and could be liable to pay compensation. Furthermore, they are harming their own businesses by excluding talented women from the work force. The Government welcome new research in that area and, in particular, look forward to the results of the Equal Opportunities Commission's investigation.

Julie Morgan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response and I am pleased that she is aware of the EOC research. Is she aware that the initial findings show that more than 1,000 women a year bring cases of pregnancy discrimination in the workplace and that the compensation they receive is £2,000 lower than for non-pregnancy discrimination dismissals? Will she take seriously the results of the EOC research and consider acting on them?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Although the final results of the EOC's investigation will not be available until 2005, we have already seen some important early information from its research. I am pleased that the investigation is focusing on the extent of the problem—how many women are affected by pregnancy discrimination—on the impact on their lives and families and on what can be done to make pregnancy a positive experience in the workplace. The EOC is also working with employers, many of whom have good practice in relation to pregnant women, so that we can learn from them what more we need to do to get rid of the few bad employers who discriminate against pregnant women, to the detriment of those women and their businesses.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I am sure that the Minister will agree that the voters of Epping Forest deserve to be commended for showing no discrimination against pregnant women when they re-elected me at the last general election with an increased majority exactly one week before the birth of my son. The Minister will therefore be in no doubt that I entirely share her aim, that of the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) and that of the EOC. However, I urge her to try to achieve that aim by changing attitudes so that it is generally recognised that a pregnant woman in employment is doing two important jobs. After all, the production of the next generation is just as important as the production of goods and services. However, I encourage the Minister not to introduce further regulation, because the more regulation we have, the more employers are likely to be dissuaded from employing and promoting good women who might bear children.

Jacqui Smith: I welcome the hon. Lady to her new position on the Front Bench. I strongly agree with her that women can be both pregnant and extremely productive, as I also know from recent experience. However, I disagree with her recommended approach. Helping women to work more flexibly, and increasing statutory maternity pay and leave, will benefit women and enable them to combine the crucial job of producing children with remaining productive in their workplace. The hon. Lady cannot will the ends unless she is able to will the means. The changes introduced by the Government will improve the position of all women, and men, in sharing responsibilities in relation to the work-life balance. I hope that she will not take the approach—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the worst employers use manifold legal devices to try to oust pregnant women? Despite the case in 1988, it is still frequently disguised as redundancy when a woman is, in fact, being sacked because she is pregnant. When the EOC finally reports, will my right hon. Friend look carefully into all the implications to see whether there is a need to tighten up the law to give better protection for pregnant women? Will she also look into increasing the compensation, which, nowadays, is too low?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. and learned Friend points to some important issues, and I am pleased that the EOC will be considering them. It is clear that case law and our current legislation make it illegal to discriminate against pregnant women, but the problem still exists, which is why we need to consider it through the investigation. We shall most certainly look at the recommendations and take action based on them. We need to ensure not only that the law is in place, but that employers—from the best to the worst—act according to both its letter and its spirit to protect and promote pregnant women.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) has already highlighted the fact that compensation for pregnant women is, on average, under £2,000 less; but is not the reality that for most employers the penalty for getting rid of a pregnant woman is only a fraction of her annual salary, so it is a quick and easy option? The fact that 21 per cent. of people know somebody who has experienced problems due to pregnancy shows that the problem is real and it should not be minimised by the Minister saying that only a minority of employers discriminate.

Jacqui Smith: I am sorry if the hon. Lady thinks that I was minimising the problem. Actually, I started with the extremely strong statement that employers who discriminate against pregnant women are breaking the law and that they could be, and should be, liable to pay compensation. I also said that we support the Equal Opportunities Commission. The hon. Lady made a point about compensation in tribunals, but there is another important argument that we need to get over to employers: to replace a leaver, an employer will spend, on average, £4,000, so not only is it wrong to get rid of women because they are pregnant, it costs the business money, too. That is why we shall continue to take legal and other action to ensure that pregnancy discrimination is outlawed.

Muslim Women (Working Practices)

22. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What steps she is taking to encourage more Muslim women to enter the labour market. [163454]

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): We are helping all women, including women in Muslim communities, to enter and remain in employment—whether part-time or full-time. Increased maternity rights, new rights for working parents, better child care, the working tax credit and the new deals for lone parents and partners, together with our economic policy, have all helped to ensure that we have more women, as well as more men, in employment than ever before.

Mr. Prentice: But does my right hon. Friend share my concern that only 17 per cent. of British Bangladeshi women aged between 16 and 59 are in the labour market and that only 24 per cent. of British Pakistani women are in employment, compared with 71 per cent. of white women? When shall we see a narrowing of the gap, so that there is the same participation among parts of our ethnic minority communities as in the white community?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point and I share his concern about the many factors, which include, in some cases, cultural attitudes and in other cases language difficulties, that keep so many Pakistani and Bangladeshi women out of employment when they would like to be in employment—society as a whole would benefit from that. I have recently discussed that issue with a group of women from Muslim communities whom I meet regularly, and I am glad that the Women's National Commission will be holding its first meeting next week with women leaders from different Muslim communities to discuss those and other difficulties that face those groups.

Pay Differentials

23. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What steps the Government are taking to reduce pay differences between men and women. [163455]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): Since 1997, the difference in median hourly pay has fallen from 16.2 percentage points to 12.9 percentage points. That reflects, in part, increases in women's opportunities in the labour market due to increased flexible working, greater maternity pay and leave, and the help that we, together with the EOC, have provided employees with to tackle unequal pay where it exists. Last week, we launched plans to streamline equal value tribunal procedures in another step to improve the way that the Equal Pay Act 1970 works in practice.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer. She may be aware that figures from the Office for National Statistics show that workers in part-time jobs are seven times more likely to be paid less than the minimum wage than workers in full-time jobs. As women form a higher proportion of the part-time work force, does she agree that dealing with that difference between part-time and full-time workers would do a lot to address the gender pay gap and that, in fact, a lot could be done by increasing awareness among women of their rights in relation to the minimum wage?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right about the national minimum wage, which has had the largest impact on low-paid women's pay since the Equal Pay Act 1970, and he is also right that we need to do everything that we can to ensure that those rights are made clear to women. Of course we also need to pursue our target to ensure that large companies carry out equal pay reviews, where the factors that cause pay differentials are often identified and action can then be taken. That is why, for example, we have again supported the Equal Opportunities Commission to produce guidance for companies and special guidance for small companies to carry out those equal pay reviews and to take the action that will help to ensure that people are fairly rewarded at work.

Business of the House

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next will be as follows:

MONDAY 29 MARCH—If necessary, consideration of Lords message followed by remaining stages of the Employment Relations Bill.

TUESDAY 30 MARCH—Opposition day [8th allotted day]. There will be a debate entitled "The Need for a Referendum on the Proposed EU Constitution" followed by a debate entitled "Failure of the Government to Prepare for Changes in Doctors' hours in the NHS". Both debates arise on an Opposition motion, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords message.

WEDNESDAY 31 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Higher Education Bill.

THURSDAY 1 APRIL—Motion on the Easter recess Adjournment.

The provisional business for the week after the Easter recess will be:

MONDAY 19 APRIL—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill.

TUESDAY 20 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

WEDNESDAY 21 APRIL—Opposition day [9th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 22 APRIL—A motion to approve the first joint report of the Accommodation and Works Committee and the Administration Committee on visitor facilities: access to Parliament.

FRIDAY 23 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business. Has he any idea of when we will debate the aviation White Paper? He will know that I have raised that issue on other occasions, but it is of importance to hon. Members on both sides of the House and, indeed, to the country.

With final council tax figures out today, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the 6 per cent. increase is three times the rate of inflation and well above low single figures? Does he realise that council tax has gone up a whopping 70 per cent. under Labour? Does he realise how unpopular that is? Is not the reason for it the fact that the Government have laden councils with extra duties without providing adequate funding? As that is the Government's fault, will he assure the House that there will be a full debate in the Chamber before any capping takes place? Does it not all show that the old adage is true: dogs bark, cats miaow and Labour Governments put up taxes? [Interruption.]. I am glad that you enjoyed that, Mr. Speaker.

Can we have a statement from the Prime Minister about his Spanish discussions on the European constitution? His spokesman said yesterday that the Prime Minister would continue to insist "that anything essential for our" criminal

"court system cannot be changed".

Does that mean in reality that we will be able to veto only in a narrow area and that everything else will simply be decided by the European Union?

In his discussions with the Libyan leader, Colonel Gaddafi, will the Prime Minister press for full information about the arms that have been sold to the IRA? Clearly, that would be helpful to the decommissioning process. Will he also ask the Libyan leader to use his special relationship with Robert Mugabe to improve the disgraceful civil rights situation in Zimbabwe? May we have a statement from the Prime Minister on both those issues, and can the Leader of the House tell us when the promised debate on Zimbabwe on the Floor of the House will take place?

Finally, will the Leader of the House join me in congratulating the England cricket team on their triumphant tour of the West Indies? Can he tell us what plans the Prime Minister has to welcome the team back? Has he already booked the reception at No. 10?

Mr. Hain: I know of no plans to book receptions, but I know that the English cricket team's performance has been magnificent. I am delighted to join the hon. Gentleman in congratulating the England team on those two brilliant victories.

On the aviation White Paper, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any further information than I have been able to give before.

The council tax increases are very low by comparison not just with what they have been in recent years, but with what they were under the Conservative Government who introduced the council tax in the first place. I understand that, on average, Conservative local authorities have had higher council tax increases in this settlement than Labour ones. That is because they are not applying themselves to their work in the way that they should. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the truth is that local government has had real-terms increases in funding of more than 25 per cent. since the Government came to power compared with what happened under the Conservatives—the party that he supports and is a member of—when there were often cuts or at least freezes in real terms in spending. That is the background against which we are operating.

On tax, the hon. Gentleman knows full well that, in 1997–98, under the last Conservative Government, the tax burden was 36 per cent. of gross domestic product. This year, it is 35.7 per cent., so the overall tax burden is, in fact, lower than that applied by the Conservatives.

On the European Union constitution, we have made it clear that we intend to stick by the negotiating red lines set out in the White Paper by the Foreign Secretary, including on key issues of criminal justice and law. It is interesting that, on tackling asylum problems and international terrorism and international crime, we have co-operated and been willing to introduce qualified majority voting—in other words, to give up the veto. We did that because back markers among other member states have dragged down our security. In the case of asylum, that led to asylum shopping where they have passed the buck to us. The new arrangements will stop that happening and provide much better protection for Britain's interests, which is what is at stake on this matter.

I notice that the hon. Gentleman did not criticise the Prime Minister's visit to Libya. I welcome that, particularly because on 19 December the deputy leader of the parliamentary Conservative party welcomed the rapprochement with Libya. It is important and in the interests of Britain and the international community that countries such as Libya—which in the past have been rogue states and sponsored terrorism including, as the hon. Gentleman said, dealing with the IRA—renounce that tradition, as Libya has, and come into compliance with the international community, including on the issue of nuclear weapons. That has been an enormous benefit of the negotiation that the British Government, led by the Foreign Secretary and with the support of the Prime Minister, have been responsible for carrying out. The visit is important for taking that forward.

Robert Mugabe is certainly one of the issues that has arisen in the negotiations that have taken place and in the relationship that is now developing. It may well be—we shall have to see—that the kind of support that Libya has so shamefully given to Mugabe over recent years in particular will come to an end. I hope so, because the hon. Gentleman and I share the view that the sooner Mugabe's despotic rule in Zimbabwe ends, the better not just for the people of Zimbabwe but for the international community.

On when there might be a debate on Zimbabwe, the hon. Gentleman knows that the Foreign Secretary has promised one. When I am in a position to tell him when it will be, I will do so.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): When does the Leader of the House intend to make a statement on security in and around this building? Can he tell us how many parliamentary security passes go missing each year? My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) extracted figures from Government Departments that show that 6,795 security passes have been lost from Government Departments in the past 12 months. Shockingly, the Ministry of Defence seems to have lost 3,007 passes in just 12 months. It scarcely gives us confidence in its response to terrorism.

Will the Leader of the House make it clear that that is much more important than the problem that could be identified as people climbing over the railings into this building? Will he lay to rest once and for all the suggestion that appeared yesterday that we are to have a concrete prison wall around these buildings with razor wire along the top? Will he explain to the public as well as to Members of Parliament that it is important that we retain this place as a monument of open democracy, rather than creating a symbol of terrorist success?

I think that the Leader of the House was here when the Solicitor-General made her statement in the House yesterday. Does he accept that there is a real problem about the contempt issue and that, if a constituent comes to our advice surgery and tells us about, say, a family court case in which they are involved, they may well be in contempt of court? In listening to them talk about that, we too could be in contempt of court. We could refer to the matter in the House but not in the media. Will he undertake to examine the issue and look again at the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege, on which I serve, which have still not been properly debated in the House?

Mr. Hain: On the last matter, I realise the hon. Gentleman's concern, which I think that we all share. The Solicitor-General is looking into that matter, especially the position of Members of Parliament and constituents, who make contact with all of us every week, if not every day. Obviously, it is an important issue and we will monitor it closely. I will keep an eye on it on behalf of the House.

On passes, I remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that it is a serious matter that must be dealt with. It is a problem principally for Government Departments, as he, to be fair to him, identified, but it is something that we must all be careful of. I hope that permanent secretaries and heads of security in Departments will take immediate action to ensure that the number of passes lost is kept to an absolute minimum and that proper procedures are in place to ensure that.

On the wider question of Parliament security and access for constituents, I share the hon. Gentleman's view that there must be openness and accessibility for all our voters and citizens because this is their Parliament, not ours. We are Members of it. It is a privilege to be voted here by them. It is important to maintain that openness and accessibility, but a balance must be struck with the security of the Palace of Westminster.

We are in a new era of threats from terrorists, including al-Qaeda and others, and we must take the proper security measures. That is what Mr. Speaker and I have been discussing with House officials and with others, including representatives of the Security Service and the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, to ensure that we achieve proper security and better security than we have now. It is an evolving matter. It changed after 11 September with the armed police around the building. Those security measures must be taken forward and we must ensure that Parliament is protected.

To summarise, we need a proper balance between—

Mr. Tyler: What about the wall?

Mr. Hain: I have read in recent days the most amazing press reports, including some on the wall, which I know nothing about and by which I would be very surprised. Mr. Speaker asked, with my support and that of members of the House of Commons Commission, for a proper independent review by the security services and the Metropolitan Police Commissioner. We await that review. Mr. Speaker took that initiative, which I very much support, to ensure that proper security measures are recommended and put in place; but, specifically on the wall, I cannot confirm that, in common with a lot of the other reports this week, and I would be very surprised if we went down that road.

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House make sure his diary is free next Tuesday afternoon so that he can meet the Prospect trade union members who are lobbying the House to oppose the Government's proposal to privatise the Forensic Science Service? Does he agree that although we have a good Government, that is an absolutely barmy policy?

Mr. Hain: I do not agree with my hon. Friend, except on the fact that we have a very good Government—I am glad that he acknowledges that. On the Forensic Science Service, he will have the opportunity to make representations to the Home Secretary—he may well have done so already—and to question Ministers during Home Office questions.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Leader of the House spoke earlier about the impact of the European Union on the United Kingdom. Is he aware that European employment directive 2000/78/EC could outlaw companies' long-service awards to their long-serving employees? Is not that a ludicrous intrusion into the sovereign domestic policy of this country? Will he arrange for the appropriate Minister to come to the Dispatch Box and make statement on the matter? Does he agree with me—I am sure that most Members do—that long-service awards are a wonderful traditional way of recognising long, loyal service by an individual to a company or firm?

Mr. Hain: I agree absolutely that long-service awards are a vital part of our culture and tradition of recognising long service. I would be astonished if that were the impact of the directive, about which I know nothing. If it were, it would be ludicrous. As for the wider picture, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is one of the reasons why I have undertaken—I know that I will have his support on the Modernisation Committee—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Oh!

Mr. Hain: Aside from the former shadow Leader of the House. Whenever I say "Modernisation Committee", he falls into rage and general—

Mr. Forth: Despair.

Mr. Hain: Despair—well, there we go. The right hon. Gentleman is a perfectly preserved antiquated Member of Parliament, and I think that he should be kept that way—and given an award for his long service in that capacity.

To return to the question asked by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), he illustrates one of the reasons why we want European scrutiny to be shared more widely, rather than to remain confined—albeit effectively and admirably—in the European Scrutiny Committee. That Committee does a great job, but Members at large ought to be more involved.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): Low pay is an issue in my constituency, especially among young people working in industries such as tourism and catering. When can we have a debate on low pay among young people, so that we can clarify the strategy to deal with it, and make sure that both sides of the House are committed in the long term to resolving the problem of the exploitation of young people?

Mr. Hain: I would very much like a debate on those lines. Perhaps the Opposition will do the House a great courtesy by calling such a debate, so that we can see what their policy is on low pay. The Government's policy is clear: we have just announced an increase in the minimum wage, including for the first time the minimum wage for young people—16 and 17-year-olds—after a recommendation from the Low Pay Commission. Low pay has been a curse of the British economy for far too long. It survived under the Conservatives, whose leader said that the introduction of the minimum wage would lead to 1 million job losses. In fact, there has been an increase of about 1.8 million jobs. We can have high pay standards, competitiveness and economic success—they should march together.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Further to the significant questions on security asked by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), although the issue is sensitive, may we have an undertaking from the Leader of the House that before, for example, a screen is installed in the Strangers Gallery or a perimeter wall is erected, there will be a debate and a vote here in the Commons?

Mr. Hain: I have made clear what would happen, as did Mr. Speaker in his letter to us all and his announcement after the February recess. After Easter, there will be a debate on security. I am grateful for the way in which the right hon. Gentleman prefaced his remarks: he understands that these are sensitive issues. The last thing that we want to do is alert potential terrorists or others to exactly what procedures we are introducing and the way in which we are coping with additional threats. He will want to join me in making sure that the House and the Chamber are free of threats from terrorists and others while preserving all the traditions and, indeed, the openness for which our democracy is renowned throughout the world.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. The reality is that Parliament is a reflection of the electorate, so it is important that he give an undertaking that major security changes that can be openly debated are debated. Will he assure us that no decisions will be taken in the Easter recess without Parliament being offered an opportunity to express an opinion?

Mr. Hain: We have already confirmed—indeed, Mr. Speaker's letter did so—that any permanent changes will be subject to decision by Parliament. I have a responsibility, as does the Speaker. Indeed, you have the primary responsibility, Mr. Speaker, along with the House authorities, the House of Commons Commission and the relevant Committees of the House, for ensuring that security arrangements are secure. We are in an entirely different era, and I do not think that my hon. Friend wants or expects us to debate every security change in the open before we decide whether to proceed with it. That would be virtually opening the door to the attacks or threats that would undoubtedly follow. Let us approach this on the basis of consensus, but also with seriousness. I do not think that my hon. Friend or the House would want me as Leader of the House or those who are actually responsible for security—I myself am not—to take a casual attitude to this extremely important issue. The House has been under attack before from terrorists, and we want to make sure that it is not again.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Will the Leader of the House confirm that, when the Finance Bill reaches the Committee of the whole House, we will have an opportunity to discuss the Chancellor's job-destroying and fraud-prone suggestions for strip stamps on bottles of Scotch whisky? Does he, like me, look forward to Scottish Labour Members, some of whom have large whisky interests in their constituencies, explaining why they voted for this damaging measure?

Mr. Hain: These matters were debated in the Budget debate, and the Budget's approach was overwhelmingly endorsed in a vote earlier this week. It is a travesty to say that those measures are job-destroying. I like a drop of malt whisky—no doubt the hon. Gentleman does too—but the Chancellor's measures are designed to stop fraud. The whisky industry, the economy and the Exchequer are the victims of widespread fraud at present. The measure is designed to stop that and protect the Scottish whisky industry in particular, so I would expect the hon. Gentleman to welcome it.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): When does the Leader of the House expect to find time to allow us to debate the appointment of the United Kingdom Commissioner to the European Union? Does he agree that that appointment is not a long-service award and that it is essential that whoever is appointed has the credibility that comes from the support of the House of Commons as a whole?

Mr. Hain: That sounds like a job application to me.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Has the Leader of the House heard the outrageous suggestion that the House should no longer sit on Fridays, thus depriving it of a valuable part of its activities? Is he also aware of the even more ridiculous suggestion that if the House did not sit on Fridays, it would somehow improve security? If that were the case, is not the logical extension of the argument that the House should not sit at all?

Mr. Hain: That suggestion appeared in reports either this morning or yesterday, and was one of the many press reports swirling around, very few of which have any connection with reality. The House has already decided to sit on 13 of the 36 days available, so we do not sit every Friday, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. He is nodding in agreement, so I assume that he approves.

Mr. Forth: No.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman wants us to sit on Friday every week.

Mr. Forth: Yes.

Mr. Hain: I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman put that to a vote and see how many of his Conservative colleagues support him. Fridays are often important days for constituency business, and allow us another day in addition to the weekend to be in our constituencies to meet and serve our constituents. He may be able to get back to Bromley on a Friday afternoon, but it is not possible for those of us who live far from London to get to our constituencies. I have seen an early-day motion to the effect that the House should not sit on Fridays, but it is only one of the many options that will no doubt be submitted to the Modernisation Committee after the review of the hours of the House conducted by the Procedure Committee.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): On security, does my right hon. Friend agree, especially in view of some newspaper reports, that it is not simply a matter of protecting Members of Parliament but the hundreds of people who work in the Commons and the Lords, who are as entitled to protection and security as ourselves? If certain measures are considered necessary in view of the acute terrorist threat, we should keep that very much in mind and not simply think about ourselves.

Mr. Hain: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. As he said, the matter affects the security not just of Members in the Chamber and elsewhere but the many staff who serve us so well and diligently. As he will recall, the assistant of the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) was attacked and killed in his surgery. Such incidents cannot be dealt with by protection in the House, but we must be alert to the security threat to everyone who works in the House, not just Members.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): What advice can the Leader of the House give to Members in whose areas post office closures have gone ahead without proper consultation or provision of information? What can we do, and is the only alternative to seek judicial review?

Mr. Hain: Clearly, there have been instances of such closures. In my capacity as Secretary of State for Wales, I am aware of cases in which there has been a lack of proper consultation and proper involvement by local Members of Parliament, which is regrettable and deplorable. However, the hon. Lady will know that there was a debate on the subject yesterday, and she herself secured an Adjournment debate on it. The Government are well aware of people's concerns, as are senior managers in the Post Office.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Next Wednesday, the House will have an opportunity further to improve the Higher Education Bill. Will my right hon. Friend do whatever he can to try to ensure that the principle of variability remains in the Bill, as it is important both for universities such as the university of Derby, with a fine tradition of encouraging young people from non-traditional backgrounds into higher education, and for universities wishing to attract additional students to minority courses? Does he also agree that the principles in the Bill of deferred fees, payment later in life and much more generous grants should be applied across the board and extended to further education where they will offer just as much, if not more, help as they will in higher education?

Mr. Hain: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend that the principle of variability allows flexibility to, for example, charge no fee for a physics course. We are short of physicists, chemists, electrical engineers and others, as there has been a long-term slide in the number of students doing such courses. An incentive through the fee structure for students to take such courses would be a big boost to the country and the economy. It is therefore imperative that the Bill go through unamended, and I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will bear that in mind. As the Secretary of State for Education and Skills made clear, any amendments could effectively kill the Bill and it is important that what the House voted for in Committee and on Second Reading goes through so that students, especially those from a low-income background, can be properly supported with new grants and other assistance, and so that universities can get the finance that they need to become world-class universities, which is essential to the future of the British economy.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): When can we have a debate on the report of the Procedure Committee on Sessional Orders so the House can decide what it wants to do about the unsightly cacophony on Parliament square? The Leader of the House may remember that I asked last year for a debate on the matter, and he said it was important and that the debate should take place sooner rather than later. A fortnight ago he was asked about it, and he said that he hoped to be able to give some welcome news in the not-too-distant future. We have not had any. What is going on?

Mr. Hain: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's concern. We are all concerned about the matter. The Home Secretary has been examining it, and when he is ready to present proposals, we will have a way forward to put to the House. The position remains that we will have a debate and a decision as soon as I am able to arrange it. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are equally concerned about the matter, because you told me so. Members on both sides of the Chamber are concerned, but we need to proceed in the proper fashion.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the House gives me an opportunity to say that I want the matter dealt with as quickly as possible.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of successful police raids this morning on unscrupulous gangmasters of the sort who operate throughout the United Kingdom. Will he congratulate the police on those successful raids? Does he agree that the police need the tools to do their job if they are to deal with the problem throughout the UK? For that, they need effective legislation. My right hon. Friend knows that a private Member's Bill is going through the House dealing with the licensing of gangmasters. Will he give the Bill not just a fair wind, but his full support by giving appropriate parliamentary time and resources so that it can become effective legislation, giving the police the tools to deal with unscrupulous gangmasters?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has done the country a service by introducing his Bill. The Government are fully supportive of it. I understand that the Committee stage is lined up for next week, and my hon. Friend should then be in pole position for Report and Third Reading on one of the remaining Fridays—14 May, 21 May, 18 June or 16 July. He can be assured that we will give the Bill what support we can. I welcome the fact that there have been some 40 arrests this morning, including some senior figures in the gangmasters operation. I know that the House will also welcome that.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): May I first add my congratulations to the England cricket team, not least to Jones the bowler—a good Welshman?

A week last Monday, I attended a celebration of the new deal in Pontypridd at one of the foremost schemes in the country, combining Jobcentre Plus activities with manpower services. Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the new deal so that we can celebrate the successes of the staff and individuals involved and consider ways in which we can continue to improve it, to reach those parts and those people that other programmes have failed to reach?

Mr. Hain: I join my hon. Friend in congratulating Simon Jones, or Jones the bowler, as he called him. That reminds the House that it is, in fact, an England and Wales cricket team and that there have been many brilliant Welsh bowlers and cricketers over the generations. We want that to continue. Simon Jones was the spearhead of the attack that destroyed the West Indies' defences. That shows what talent is coming out of Wales.

On the new deal, my hon. Friend is right. It has done fantastic work in former coalmining communities such as those that he and I represent. In trial pilots that are going on in his area, it is tackling the problem of people who have been in a state of long-term economic inactivity and on incapacity benefit. That is one of the many reasons why it is imperative that the new deal stay in place. I see that the Liberal Democrats are joining the Tories in an extreme right-wing measure that would abolish the new deal, thereby barring many thousands of people across Britain, including those with disabilities, from getting the support and the personal advice that would enable them to get into the jobs market, which everyone should welcome.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Is it possible to arrange for the Secretary of State for Health to make a statement to the House next week about the guidelines that his Department gives to national health service trusts about the suspension of members of staff? About 1,000 members of NHS staff are currently suspended, costing millions of pounds and no doubt resulting in operations being delayed. The issue was highlighted clearly and starkly by the absurd suspension of Dr. Hope, who, I understand, has now got his job back, but who is a neurosurgeon whose suspension delayed operations simply because he wanted more croutons in his soup. That is ridiculous. There must be sufficiently sane guidelines in place to ensure that such insanity does not happen in the future.

Mr. Hain: If those reports were true, I agree that that was pretty insane. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and his Ministers will have taken careful note of the hon. Gentleman's points.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that one of the strengths of the ITV network in the past has been the regional system of broadcasting so that the English regions, Scotland and Wales have had proper reporting of events in their local areas. That has come under threat with the Carlton-Granada merger. There was a lobby of Parliament this week by the National Union of Journalists and BECTU, and concerns have been expressed that rationalisation taking place in the midlands presages future centralisation among the ITV companies. Will my right hon. Friend take on board the fact that when the Government passed the Communications Act 2003 they placed on Ofcom a duty to examine the regional distribution of broadcasting? Will he draw that to Ofcom's attention and call for more action from it?

Mr. Hain: Ministers in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport will note my hon. Friend's comments and take careful steps to ensure that the points he has made are looked into. I agree that it is imperative that regional and—in the case of Scotland and Wales—national broadcasting through the ITV network retains its distinctive flavour and makes sure that news, especially, and culture are reflected in its content and programming, and that the necessary resources are available. After the chaotic near-destruction of the ITV network under the Government of Margaret Thatcher, I hope we will see an ITV that is effectively a unified service providing quality national programming and allowing regional and national broadcasts to take place in the way that I described. But BECTU's concerns must be addressed as they are clearly important.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Does the Leader of the House agree that events during the past week in the middle east have made it more important for us to consider the subject, and that an hour-and-a-half debate in Westminster Hall—even if I managed to catch the Speaker's eye, or whatever the term is for gaining debates in Westminster Hall—would not be adequate to cover it? Will the right hon. Gentleman consider holding a full debate in the Chamber on the situation in the middle east as soon as possible, or do the Government just have nothing to say on the matter?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady spoiled an important and effective point by that last comment, and I ask her to withdraw it or reflect on it. She, I, the Government and, I expect, the entire House take the same position on the matter and deplore the assassination of Sheikh Yassin. The Government work tirelessly to try to secure peace in the middle east, including on an independent Palestinian state, security for the state of Israel and recognition by surrounding Arab states that Israel's future must be secure. That is what we should work towards. If the hon. Lady is successful in securing an hour-and-a-half debate on the subject, it would enable everybody to say pretty much the same thing—that we share in the condemnation of such attacks, and of suicide bombings, and that we want to work together to find the best way to solve an intractable problem.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the report by the Prime Minister's strategy unit about the future of the sea-fishing industry, published this morning, is deeply significant for coastal communities across the United Kingdom? The industry is vital for some of the most remote communities in the country. Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate as soon as possible after Easter so that all right hon. and hon. Members who have an interest in the issue, which is a matter of life and death for those communities, can discuss it and the prospects for a sustainable future for many of our constituents?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly consider that request, because, as the Fisheries Minister has made clear, the Government share my hon. Friend's concerns and his support for the report, which points the way towards sustainable fishing. Sustainable fishing is at the heart of the issue because our seas have been depleted and fish stocks are being eradicated at an alarming rate. We must work towards a more sustainable future for fishing, because there will be no jobs if fish stocks are exhausted, and the report points the way towards achieving that future.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on ethical foreign policy, which we do not hear much about these days? Such a debate would give us an opportunity to discuss Gaddafi's support for terrorism, and human rights, democracy and good governance—or otherwise—in Libya, and, in particular, overall responsibility for the murder of Yvonne Fletcher and for the mass murder of people at Lockerbie. Some of us fear that ethical foreign policy is being replaced by a culture of impunity for a dictator who may or may not bear overall responsibility for mass murder.

Mr. Hain: It is not clear from the hon. Gentleman's question whether he supports the Government's initiative.

Mr. Robathan: I asked for a debate.

Mr. Hain: Indeed, but does the hon. Gentleman support the Government's policy of bringing Libya into the international community rather than its sitting outside as a rogue state? I should have thought that everybody would support the policy, and the Prime Minister's visit has been welcomed by the families of victims of the Lockerbie disaster and, indeed, by the family of WPC Fletcher. The problem goes back over many years, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) began to resolve it, a process that the Foreign Secretary has taken forward. The Prime Minister's visit symbolises the beginning of a new process by which Libya complies fully with international standards.

[Mr. Hain]

As for ethical foreign policy, the truth is that the Government, through an arms exports policy that bans the export of arms that could be used for internal repression or external aggression, have adopted a policy based on the highest possible standards and ethics, which stands scrutiny anywhere in the world. In many other respects, we promote human rights across the world.

Mr. Robathan indicated dissent.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but the Conservative Government had a shabby record on arms exports and human rights. The Labour Government have established a good reputation as a result of the high standards that we have introduced.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Yesterday was an Opposition half day, and, once again, the subject matter was not revealed to the rest of the House until the morning of the debate. I understand why the official Opposition take some time to dream up a subject on which they can attack the Government, but whether that is a matter of tactics or incompetence, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is not right or fair to the rest of the House for the subject matter of Opposition debates to be brought up at the last minute, which happens frequently? Will he consider introducing a system whereby, if fair notice of the subject matter for Opposition day debates is not given, the time will be forfeit and awarded either to the other Opposition parties or, indeed, to the Government to focus on the consequences of Tory policies, if the Conservative party were elected.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friends shout, "Good idea" and, "Hear, hear" at that suggestion. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) makes an important point, which I have raised with the shadow Leader of the House on a number of occasions, although, to be fair, I know that advance notice has been given of next week's Opposition topics, for which I am grateful. None the less, my hon. Friend cannot intervene in a debate on, for example, post offices, if he can only find out the topic on the morning of the debate, and that prevents hon. Members from organising their business. Advance notice is courteous to the House and is part of good procedure and process. I hope that the Opposition will bear that in mind, as they have done for next week.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): This week, the National Institute for Clinical Excellence took the unusual step of recommending the withdrawal of disposable tonsillectomy instruments following a number of unfortunate post-operative haemorrhages and an audit by the university of Birmingham. Does the Leader of the House agree that the Secretary of State for Health should come to the House to explain why his Department advised the use of those instruments in the first place? Does he agree with the parents of deceased toddler Crawford Roney that an urgent investigation is needed into exactly what went wrong in Richmond house three or four years ago?

Mr. Hain: That incident is obviously serious, which is why the Secretary of State has put in place stringent standards and inspection arrangements. I know that the Secretary of State for Health will take careful note of the hon. Gentleman's points and make sure that the appropriate procedures and policies are implemented.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): In the light of the publication of final council tax levels from local authorities, will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate about the future of local taxation, so that we can compare and contrast various proposals, particularly local income tax? We could also consider the effect of the £100 to help pensioners with their council tax that the Chancellor recently announced.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend's suggestion is welcome, and business managers and the Deputy Prime Minister will want to examine it. The House would do well to reflect on the different solutions to the problems with council tax, which we inherited from the previous Government and have continued to operate. On the one hand, the Government are committed to low council tax increases, as evidenced by the general level of settlement this time; on the other hand, the shadow Chancellor has announced that a future Conservative Government would cut local government budgets by £2.4 billion in their first two years, which would result in sky-high council tax increases. That is the choice: it is between a Labour Government who continue to invest in high standards of public service and provide local government with the resources that it needs, or a Conservative Government committed to cutting local government budgets, which would put council tax increases through the roof.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): May we have a debate on the music industry, which the National Music Council reports as contributing £3.6 billion per year to the UK economy? Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge that protecting copyright is important to the health of the industry, which loses £241 million a year through internet downloads? The key is to educate people about the importance of copyright protection, and can we therefore debate today's announcement by the British Phonographic Industry, which is launching a scheme to warn significant illegal uploaders of music on to the internet that they are breaching the law?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is an accomplished guitarist, and he therefore takes a personal interest in the matter. All music lovers want to know that our music industry is properly protected, and that the sort of practices to which he referred are not allowed to continue without restriction. I know that the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and for Culture, Media and Sport will study his remarks closely, and they are alive to the problem, which they are working on solving.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on human rights and fair trials abroad following the sentencing of my constituent, Majid Narwaz, to five years in prison in Cairo? He has already been detained there for two years. His trial was a disgrace, and the charges were entirely trumped up. When the Leader of the House arranges such a debate, will he ask the Prime Minister to attend and to explain to the House why he has refused to get involved in that case?

Mr. Hain: Such cases are sensitive. The hon. Gentleman has properly raised the case of his constituent on the Floor of the House, and the Foreign Secretary will want to study his remarks closely. However, there have been serious problems with terrorism in Egypt, and the Egyptian authorities have repeatedly made representations to us about British citizens whom they allege are involved. I do not know whether that is true, but the hon. Gentleman takes one view of that particular case, and the Foreign Office will want to study what he said closely.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I fully realise the sensitivities of this issue, but is the Leader of the House in a position to confirm that he has taken security advice on the type and scope of demonstrations in Parliament square? It clearly makes very little sense at the moment to allow the erection of a series of banners that form a barrier directly outside the main entrance to Parliament, restricting the field of view and the ability of the armed police to operate.

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. There is a balance to be struck between the right to protest, which is an ancient and honourable part of our democracy—the hon. Gentleman is nodding in agreement—and proper security for the House of Commons in an era of terrorism and threats from al-Qaeda directed specifically at Britain and at important institutions of the British state, including Westminster.

Points of Order

1.20 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In light of the remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz), it might be helpful if I indicate that the Opposition generally provide the topics for their Opposition days if they fall on a Monday or a Tuesday, but in the interests of topicality we do not do that in respect of Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Mr. Speaker: That sounds more like putting the matter on the record than a point of order.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I caught the tail end of the comments of the Leader of the House on council tax, when he talked about the policy of Her Majesty's Opposition. Will you confirm that it is still a rule of the House that Ministers are present to account for the actions of the Government? They are here to account for what they said in their manifesto, such as:

"We will not introduce top-up fees and have legislated to prevent them"; or saying, "We will reform the House of Lords." They are here to account for what the Government are doing, or not doing, not for what the Opposition may do in future.

Mr. Speaker: I have repeated time and again that at Question Time, including during business questions, Ministers should not indulge in speaking about the policies of the Opposition or of the Liberal Democrats while attempting to answer the question—they should be accountable for their own portfolio. I make it clear that it is different in a debate on the Floor of the House, when everything is open to criticism, including the policies of Her Majesty's Opposition.

Employment Relations Bill (Programme) (No. 3)

1.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I beg to move,

That the Programme Order of 14th January 2004 in relation to the Employment Relations Bill (as amended by the Order of 9th February 2004 (Employment Relations Bill (Programme) (No. 2)) be varied as follows—

Consideration and Third Reading

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order of 14th January 2004 shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion three hours after those proceedings are commenced.

3. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion four hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration.

The motion will allow full debate on the Government new clauses on intimidation during statutory recognition ballots and remaining important topics such as workplace bullying, information and consultation, and the union modernisation fund. The Bill has made good progress and I hope that this will be a short debate.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I listened carefully to what the Minister said. I gather that we will have three hours on Report and one hour on Third Reading. In normal circumstances, that might well have been perfectly adequate. Now, though, the Bill is substantially longer than it was when it went into Committee—it now runs to 49 pages, 50 clauses and two schedules. The Government have already added two important new clauses in Committee: new clause 28 on exclusion and expulsion from trade unions, and new clause 46, the union modernisation clause—the bung or bribe to trade unions, which we debated at some length. The problem is that when new clauses are tabled in Committee, we can debate them but not amend them. That is why we will need some time to discuss them on Report.

The Bill is the product of an exercise involving discussions with several parties, including the TUC, the CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation, the Institute of Directors and British Chambers of Commerce. There was widespread consensus. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) said on Second Reading that he feared that the Bill would be used by the Government as a sort of Christmas tree on which to hang other clauses, or so-called baubles. As I said, we have already debated two new clauses in Committee, including that on the modernisation fund for trade unions—an unlimited amount of money that is to be made available to trade unions for modernisation, which as we have said on several occasions, is simply a bung to the trade unions.

When we complained on Second Reading that the Bill might be used as a Christmas tree for further new clauses, the Minister said, "You're scaremongering", "Calm down", "Relax", "Take it easy", "Don't get carried away." He said, "This Bill is the product of a consensus-building exercise and we're going to stick very much to the original format." Imagine my amazement and disbelief when I heard yesterday that the Government have tabled not one new clause, but four, in addition to the one that they had already tabled. We have new clause 5,

"Additional duties on employers informed of ballots";

new clause 6,

"Unfair practices in relation to recognition ballots";

new clause 7,

"Unfair practices in relation to derecognition ballots";

and new clause 8,

"Unfair practices: power to make provision about periods before notice of ballot".

Those may be excellent new clauses—I am sure that they are—but they were tabled only yesterday. We have two working days when the House is sitting to digest, analyse and try to understand them, yet they are highly complicated, and I put it to the Minister that each will require a great deal of time for discussion. For example, new clause 5 runs to nearly four pages and contains a lot of highly technical material. The Minister will have to explain to the House exactly what the "additional duties on employers" will be; what employers can and cannot do; what "inducing" means; and what "relevant meetings" are. Surely, he will require at least 10 minutes on each new clause, while Opposition Front Benchers will require five or six minutes, and many other hon. Members will have a few words to say.

The Government are trying to rush through the Report stage. I am disappointed about that, because it will be difficult for us to get our heads around all the new clauses and other amendments in such a limited time. My hon. Friends and I have tabled two fairly simple new clauses on intimidation and on appeals, as well as an amendment on the information and consultation directive; and the Liberal Democrats have tabled a couple of amendments and a new clause.

The key factor is that the Government have said all along that the Bill was the product of a consensus-building exercise involving the main employer and employee organisations, but they have departed from that script by using it to add to the Christmas tree a number of new clauses and additional measures. They have departed from the spirit that was the background to the Bill. I do not know how much time the Minister has spent talking to the trade unions, but has he spoken to the CBI, the Institute of Directors or the Engineering Employers Federation about the four new clauses? We have been given two working days to deal with them; how will they have a chance to analyse them, report back and explain the situation to interested members?

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Has the Minister sought to reach an agreement with my hon. Friend on the extra time that might be necessary to discuss the Government new clauses? If the Minister is really interested in consensus, one would have thought that he would start out by trying to achieve it on this business matter.

Mr. Bellingham: I thank my right hon. Friend. The Minister and I have got on very well recently. He has taken me to one side to discuss the matter on several occasions. I have made it quite clear to him that, although we appreciate that type of discussion and liaison, we need more time. He has invited me and some other colleagues to the Department of Trade and Industry for a drink next week, but by then it will be far too late.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): What explanation has been forthcoming from the Government about why so many new clauses are necessary at this late stage? If the Bill is well thought out, why were those new clauses not tabled some time ago, to enable consultation with the Opposition and employer organisations? It is not acceptable to table a huge chunk of new clauses without having time to consult the various interested bodies that will have to implement the regulations.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful for that intervention, because on Second Reading the Secretary of State made great play of the fact that she had gone out of her way to talk to everyone and had achieved broad agreement on the Bill. She made it clear that the Bill was based on the information and consultation directive, which is an EU directive that we would normally expect to be introduced as a statutory instrument. In fact, it has come before us as a clause in primary legislation.

The Secretary of State also made it clear that the Government had to respond to the Wilson and Palmer case and the Friction Dynamics case, and she said that she had had far-reaching discussions with all the organisations, particularly the employer organisations. She mentioned a close relationship with the IOD, the CBI, the EEF, the BCC and other organisations. I should think that they are staggered, flabbergasted and dismayed at this raft of new clauses, which are complicated and highly technical. How on earth can those organisations go through the new clauses, and provide proper briefings for their members and for Members of Parliament in such a limited amount of time?

My party is very disappointed at the way in which the Government have behaved. I pay tribute to the Minister for keeping me in the loop, keeping me informed and being open, but we cannot get away from the fact that the Government have departed from their agreement with all parties in business and industry, and with the House, not to add a whole lot of highly technical, complicated new clauses to the Bill. They should have introduced the clauses well in advance, because the Bill has been around for a long time. The Conservatives are not happy campers, which is why we will ask the House—

Mr. Greg Knight: I have to say that the more I listen to what my hon. Friend has to say, the more I feel that this whole situation is highly unsatisfactory. Has he suggested to the Minister that he consider withdrawing the motion and perhaps inviting us all round for a drink, to see whether that might produce an acceptable way forward?

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. The Minister has invited us—one or two select colleagues—to the DTI for a drink, although perhaps I should not mention that in public because I might destroy his reputation. It is possibly a little premature to go to the DTI to celebrate the completion of consideration of the Bill when we have not even agreed the programme motion. The motion will curtail debate, which is why we are very unhappy with it. I urge the House to vote against it.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): For personal reasons, I have not been able to be in the House this week until today, which might be why I have not received any notice of or been consulted on the programme motion—or received an invitation to a drink. The serious point is that although we support the Bill, as the Minister well knows, and have not moved from that principle, I concur with the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) that it is not entirely adequate to allow what is in effect a half day to complete consideration of the Bill, given that it has been changed and there are various Opposition issues to be debated. It is not a question of wanting x or y hours, but we want enough time to ensure that the Government new clauses and amendments are properly discussed, and that Opposition concerns are properly addressed. For example, we had a heated debate on the money resolution for additional union funding, about which both main Opposition parties expressed concern. The House might want a fuller debate on that, on the basis of what we have heard.

As the Government have said, the anti-discrimination clauses were difficult to draft. There is more or less universal support for them in principle, but some examination of how they will work in practice will clearly be relevant. As the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk pointed out, my hon. Friends and I have tabled amendments on issues that we continue to regard as important. I do not wish to detain the House by arguing in detail now which issues we think need to be expanded on, but I am a little surprised, given that the Bill has changed and there are important issues to resolve, that the Government feel justified in imposing such a tight timetable. On that basis, I concur with the hon. Gentleman in opposing the programme motion.

1.35 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am shocked, saddened and surprised by this afternoon's events, although we know that Opposition Members often oppose programme motions. To answer the points made by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), the Government have not deviated in any way from their consultation process, which is why we are in this situation. There is a full consultation process, which involves talking to the employer organisations and trade unions, and we have not deviated from that. The Bill's progress has been excellent, and there have been good, meaningful debates on many issues. I am sure that we can have more of those debates on Monday within the time allotted.

This afternoon's debate has been about the Opposition's problems with programme motions. We have heard about bungs and baubles, and about shock and amazement. There are serious issues to discuss, but there is adequate time for that. I hope that the House supports the work that has been going on through the usual channels, and that hon. Members will support the programme motion.

Defence Policy

[Relevant documents: Delivering Security in a Changing World: Defence White Paper (Cm6041–I); Delivering Security in a Changing World: Supporting Essays (Cm6041–II); Uncorrected Oral Evidence taken before the Defence Committee on 24th March 2004, from General Sir Michael Walker GCB CMG CBE ADC Gen, Chief of Defence Staff, Admiral Sir Alan West GCB DSC ADC, First Sea Lord and Chief of the Naval Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson KCB CBE DSO ADC Gen, Chief of the General Staff and Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup KCB AFC ADC, Chief of the Air Staff, on the Defence White Paper (HC465–i)]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

1.50 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): At the start of the debate, may I extend my condolences to the family of Brigadier Lord Vivian, who died recently? I had the privilege of meeting him on several occasions, and he was both knowledgeable and thoughtful, certainly when discussing defence issues.

The publication last December of the Defence White Paper, "Delivering Security in a Changing World", generated significant interest, so I welcome this opportunity for the House to debate the issues with which it dealt.

First of all, however, I would like to take this opportunity to condemn the appalling terrorist attacks in Madrid two weeks ago. I am sure that the House will join me in extending our sympathies to those who have lost loved ones—and, indeed, to the Spanish people. The appalling scale of those co-ordinated attacks, using devices deliberately set to detonate simultaneously on crowded trains at the height of rush hour, once again demonstrates the callous and barbarous nature of international terrorists. The attack was calculated to take as many innocent lives as possible. It was the latest in a series of such atrocities, going back well before 11 September to the bombings of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. The fanatics who are responsible will stop at nothing to cause death and destruction on a massive scale.

It is therefore inevitable that there is increased anxiety about the prospect of similar attacks occurring here. I want to emphasise to the House that the threat of attack has been recognised across government. Since 11 September, in particular, a huge amount of work has been undertaken to prepare contingency plans. In the UK the civil authorities are responsible for crisis and consequence management, with the Home Office taking the lead for counter-terrorism policy at home. The Civil Contingencies Bill will provide an important and necessary enhancement to the civil authorities' ability to respond to emergencies and rightly places emphasis on civil resilience.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Does the Secretary of State share the view of the head of the Metropolitan police, Sir John Stevens, that an attack on London is inevitable?

Mr. Hoon: I regret that, given the evidence that we have seen from elsewhere, the Government have consistently had to take that view and we obviously have to prepare and plan for it.

[Mr. Hoon]

I was outlining where the civil responsibilities lie, but the armed forces clearly have the skills, training, command and control to provide valuable assistance to civilian capabilities when necessary. They will frequently have a role to play. Most recently, they were deployed to Heathrow airport in support of the police to act as a deterrent when intelligence warned of a potential attack.

Following the strategic defence review new chapter, the Ministry of Defence introduced a number of measures to enhance our ability to respond to a crisis at home. Those measures include the development of command and control arrangements, the establishment of a network of joint regional liaison officers, and the introduction of communications equipment compatible with that used by the police.

Across the country, we have also established 14 civil contingency reaction forces, which are now fully operational. They provide a pool of volunteer reserves available to deploy at short notice to assist the civil authorities at the scene of an incident—whether it is a terrorist attack, accident or natural disaster. But while we must be prepared to support the civil authorities here in the United Kingdom, it is vital that we address the threats to us before they even reach our shores.

The White Paper sets out the requirement for this country to be ready, willing and able to deploy overseas to act against terrorists and the states that harbour them. It also sets out the threat posed by the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the consequence of failed and failing states. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is perhaps at its most chilling when it coincides with the desire of international terrorist groups to acquire and to use them. The law and order vacuum in failed states provides opportunities for those groups to flourish and a safe haven from which to operate.

In addition, where possible, we will work together with the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development to tackle the root causes of terrorism. The Government's conflict prevention pool is made available to provide funding for measures such as security sector reform and post-conflict recovery, which help to tackle the underlying causes of instability in many of the world's potential flashpoints. In recent years, the armed forces have made a significant contribution to peace and support operations in Bosnia, Kosovo, Sierra Leone, East Timor and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. More widely, the Ministry of Defence has undertaken defence diplomacy activities to encourage the responsible development of military capabilities. Those commitments have been crucial in support of stability in numerous countries.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State mentioned various operations around the world. The last theatre of conflict was a very large operation, namely our contribution to the invasion of Iraq, which Conservative Members supported. If we had to launch another such large-scale operation—perhaps next year or the following year—would we be able to do so?

Mr. Hoon: As the Chief of the Defence Staff made clear in his evidence to the Defence Committee yesterday, it will take a number of years to recover properly in respect of exercises and the sort of training that is required. Obviously, however, if there were an immediate national reason for conducting a large-scale operation in a much shorter time scale, I know from my knowledge and experience of our armed forces that they would be able to mount it. It would necessarily mean that some of our existing commitments would have to be qualified in order to achieve that, but such operations would be undertaken, not least if this country were threatened.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The Secretary of State for Defence has rightly drawn attention to the excellent peacekeeping work that members of Her Majesty's armed forces are undertaking in various parts of the world—including in southern Iraq, where 500 troops from the Colchester garrison are based. Will he accept, however, that continued overseas commitments are putting a strain on our Army, and that the armed forces are still under strength? Although recruitment is going well, does he accept that there is a need for greater emphasis on retention; otherwise, the overstretch will become unbearable?

Mr. Hoon: In fact, both recruitment and retention rates are extremely good at present, but I accept the hon. Gentleman's observation that we need to continue to augment the size of our armed forces and, indeed, to develop particular skills—a matter that I shall deal with in more detail later. It is clear that there are some strains on particular people in the armed forces—those in support and enabling positions, for example. That is inevitable if, as is the case, we are engaged in several different operations simultaneously.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): I was very surprised to hear the Chief of the Defence Staff say yesterday that it would be another four years before we would be capable of carrying out a large-scale operation again. That seems an extremely long time, so could the Secretary of State offer the House some guidance about the precise thinking of the Chief of the Defence Staff in reaching that judgment about the four years that it would take for a large operation to be mounted again?

Mr. Hoon: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's use of the term "capable" is fair in respect of what the Chief of the Defence Staff actually said. I have already answered the point in detail, but I am perfectly willing to repeat it: to prepare for a large-scale operation, it would be necessary to train, exercise and develop the necessary skills in the time frame set out by the Chief of the Defence Staff, but our forces would be "capable" of conducting a large operation before that, if it were necessary. As the Chief of the Defence Staff explained, however, that would necessarily have some implications for our existing commitments. The Minister of State has explained that position on previous occasions. I know from the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the Department that none of that will come as a great surprise to him.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): I would like some reassurance from my right hon. Friend. When I visited our troops in Bosnia in 1998, I was astounded by the fact that they had to use mobile phones to ensure effective communication between each other. Mobile phones are, of course, easy to track and to listen into. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that that arrangement is not still the case today?

Mr. Hoon: It is not the case today. I shall set out in greater detail the significant advances that have been made, and are about to be made, in the provision of enhanced communications equipment. That has been an absolute priority for the Government. I recognise the difficulties in delivering such programmes that previous Governments have encountered over a long period of time. However, the Bowman programme is on the verge of success. I welcome the efforts that have been made.

I was outlining the commitments made by UK armed forces around the world. Only last week, in response to escalating levels of tension and violence between ethnic Albanians and Serbs in Kosovo, additional UK troops were deployed in support of KFOR. The Ready Battalion of NATO's operational reserve force and the 1st Battalion, the Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment had been earmarked precisely for such a rapid deployment. Their role, which I anticipate will be short term, is to assist KFOR in restoring calm to the province and preventing unrest from spreading to areas outside Kosovo. It is an example of the kind of rapid deployment capability that we will increasingly need to be able to call on.

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): I am worried that, if we cannot settle Kosovo's final status, its economy will remain dreadful. Unemployment is enormous, which means that the atmosphere is tense and likely to be disorderly. The military situation will not be resolved unless we get political progress.

Mr. Hoon: I agree. The events before last weekend illustrate the continuing difficulties between the two communities. A number of Serb families were forced to leave their homes, and Serb churches were burned. That suggests that the presence of our troops is still necessary, but it also shows that we must make progress on a constitutional and political settlement to avoid our military responsibility going on indefinitely.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State agree with the NATO Secretary-General and one of the senior members of UNMIK, who said that the unrest was almost certainly organised by Albanian separatists? Will he confirm that at least 3,000 Serbs and members of other ethnic minorities have lost their homes?

Mr. Hoon: I have looked carefully at the evidence, and I am not sure that any of it points to an especially sophisticated organisation. As I said in response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), there are such simmering tensions between the two communities that any incident—whether true or not—can set off the sort of violent and dangerous reaction that we have seen. Clearly, that has real implications for the presence there of troops from the UK and other countries.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State will know that members of the Select Committee on Defence were in Kosovo a few weeks ago and what we heard made all of us worried about what was happening there. Although it is important to resolve the status of Kosovo, will he assure the House that there will not be a final status agreement without guarantees about human rights and the rule of law? Also, does he agree that we must clamp down on the criminal, mafia society in Kosovo, and the leading Albanian politicians there who are behind it?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly give that undertaking in respect of human rights. That was one of the reasons we went into Kosovo, and our other aim was to preserve a multi-ethnic society. We were right to go and protect the Albanian community against the appalling treatment by Milosevic's regime, but the recent events in Kosovo suggest that Albanians are perpetrating behaviour that is similar to what the Serb minority did. That is of great concern to us.

The threats that we now face are ever more fluid, and less predictable than the monolithic Warsaw pact that dominated our defence planning and posture for two generations or more. However, they are no less real, and no less dangerous. Our armed forces have to adapt as a result.

The strategic defence review set us in the right direction, with its emphasis on expeditionary force. The defence White Paper builds on this work to present the case for still more flexible forces, structured and equipped to perform a wide range of tasks, often concurrently, in simultaneous operations in different parts of the world. The success of the operations that we undertake will be measured more by our ability to exploit fleeting opportunities to engage an elusive enemy, and in deterring and disrupting future terrorist activity, than in any decisive pitched battle.

The rebalancing of our armed forces is therefore required, with flexibility being the key. Experience has shown us that we should plan on structuring, equipping and supporting our armed forces to deploy rapidly on concurrent small and medium scale operations. That pattern has become the norm in recent years, and it is likely to remain the trend for the foreseeable future.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): My right hon. Friend speaks of supporting our armed forces in this changed environment, so after yesterday's announcement by the Ministry of Defence, will he assure me that the MOD remains committed to the success of the Red Dragon project at RAF St. Athan?

Mr. Hoon: I assure my hon. Friend that we remain absolutely committed to that project. We believe that the people engaged in it have a significant role to play in the future.

Obviously, we need to ensure that our armed forces retain the ability to adapt themselves at longer notice for the much less frequent, but more demanding, large-scale operations. We must continue to keep up to date our approach to standing tasks and commitments. The White Paper seeks to strike the right balance.

Where military action is used, it is clear that it is most effective when brought to bear through multinational coalitions and alliances. The ability to operate seamlessly alongside other nations, particularly with our NATO and European Union allies and partners, is therefore at a premium.

We plan to maintain a broad spectrum of capabilities to ensure that we are able to conduct national operations, or be the lead or framework nation for coalition operations, at small to medium scale. However, we do not envisage needing to generate large-scale capabilities across the same spectrum as, in the most demanding operations, it is highly unlikely that the US will not be involved, either leading a coalition or as part of NATO. For large-scale operations, our focus nationally must be on the retention and development of capabilities that ensure a seat at the political and military decision-making table, securing for the UK an appropriate level of influence in the planning and prosecution of operations. Therefore, the armed forces must be able to interoperate with US command and control structures, match their operational tempo, and provide credible and significant capabilities that provide the greatest impact.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. He is making an excellent speech and I am sure that he will be a first-class European Commissioner in due course. I am interested in the process of determining capacity in respect of building ships and aircraft carriers. Obviously, we want to obtain value for money in the order for aircraft carriers, but does he agree that it is also essential to take account of the totality of shipbuilding procurement? Would we not be able to secure much better value for money if the MARS—military afloat reach and sustainability—initiative orders and the orders for aircraft carriers and frigates were all taken together? In that way, the peaks and troughs in demand that would otherwise impact on the shipbuilding industry could be smoothed out.

Mr. Hoon: I have always appreciated my hon. Friend's compliments, but I am somewhat disappointed that he is so anxious to get rid of me.

Bob Russell: It is friendly fire.

Mr. Hoon: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) to the extent that it is necessary for the MOD to assist the shipbuilding industry in securing civil orders as well as military orders. The MOD has a tremendous order book for warships at the moment, but that will not sustain shipbuilding indefinitely. The MOD can make a significant contribution to shipbuilding, but the industry should not assume that those orders will keep it going indefinitely. My hon. Friend talks about smoothing out supply and demand, but that has to come from the civil orders. They supplement the military orders, and will provide a long-term future for UK shipbuilding.

I was talking about the necessity of interoperating with the US. However, I emphasise that we are simply focusing on niche capabilities that the US is short of. We should not want to confine ourselves to only a supporting role in military operations. In order to meet our own security objectives, we will need to continue to be at the forefront of operations. The changes that the White Paper sets out will enhance the UK's ability to conduct expeditionary operations, both nationally and, as is most likely to be the case, as part of a coalition of allies.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, who has been most generous in allowing interventions. On co-operation with the United States, does he agree with Robert Maggi, the head of defence trade controls at the US State Department, that in looking towards conflict prevention and the illicit transfer of conventional weapons to non-state actors, the ability to apply effective controls to such transfers, including extra-territorial controls, is critical?

Mr. Hoon: We have certainly looked at that. By way of qualification, I should say that if we introduce such controls, it is important that they be introduced multilaterally. It is necessary that new nations should also be subject to the existing code of conduct, which could be reformed to take account of such particular illicit transfers, or to other international agreements. I would be concerned if the UK moved too far ahead of other countries that might then be tempted simply to step in and fill the trade void that we had left.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Before we leave the subject of expeditions, may I add, as chairman of the all-party Latin American group, that we, the European delegates, were warmly welcomed by Vicente Fox? May I ask about the strange business of the servicemen who are caving in Mexico? What are we to make of it? Surely it would have been courteous and tactful to tell the Mexicans that servicemen were going there.

Mr. Hoon: I am always impressed by the range of my hon. Friend's interests and concerns and he has just added a new one to the long list with which I am familiar. I was referring to Latin America, not caving, but I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister will have noted those wise observations.

NATO of course remains the cornerstone of our security policy. Lord Robertson, in his capacity as Secretary-General of NATO, worked tirelessly to adapt NATO to the challenges that it is likely to face. His successor, whose appointment I welcome, has promised to continue this work. As technology develops, it will become even more important that we and our NATO partners invest in the capabilities that enable us to operate at the same tempo as the United States. We are actively encouraging this approach through the Allied Command Transformation and the development of the NATO response force, with its emphasis on flexible, deployable and technologically advanced and interoperable forces.

The Prague capabilities commitment is making progress. Our allies have committed themselves to improvements in key areas such as nuclear, biological and chemical capabilities, secure communications, strategic lift and air-to-air refuelling. Looking forward to this year's Istanbul NATO summit, we will try to ensure that our allies deliver these capability improvements. NATO needs to be leaner, more responsive and fit for new challenges. We therefore support a broad review of NATO structures, processes and decision making.

Where NATO as a whole chooses not to engage, it is likely that we will work with our European allies. Improving the military effectiveness of European nations therefore remains a key priority. Hence our proposal that EU member states should develop rapid response capabilities through the battle group initiative. Building on the progress towards achieving the Helsinki headline goal, member states, individually or on a multinational basis, will provide deployable and sustainable battle groups of around 1,500 troops, drawn from existing national forces. Having high readiness forces available will improve the ability of the European Union to respond effectively to emerging crises, particularly in support of the United Nations. We will ensure that this initiative is developed in a way that also strengthens NATO and the NATO response force.

There is no conflict between aspiring to strengthen both NATO and European defence and security policy. We will not agree to ESDP developing in a way that impairs the security guarantee established through NATO. The security architecture that we have constructed over the past six years allows for flexible approaches to crises either through a NATO operation or the EU using NATO assets under Berlin-plus arrangements, or indeed through an autonomous EU operation.

The EU and NATO have established a strategic partnership in crisis management that we want to see strengthened. The arrangements for EU-NATO consultation agreed last December were a significant step forward. Regular dialogue between the EU and NATO would be stepped up during a crisis. That ensures that the relationship between the two organisations is transparent and mutually reinforcing.

In directing our finite resources at those capabilities that are best able to deliver the range of military effects that we require, we will inevitably have to make important choices. As we indicated in the White Paper, we will look to create the headroom for highest priority investments in network enabled capabilities and medium weight forces.

Central to our thinking on network-enabled capabilities is the need to improve the collection of information on the battle space and enable those in charge of ships, tanks, aircraft and other combat systems to be able to share that information more quickly. The Watchkeeper unmanned aerial vehicle, for example, will provide a substantial increase in surveillance capability over the Phoenix system currently in service. The Bowman secure tactical voice and data communications system will markedly improve our ability to share information. Such improvements in equipment capability will enable those involved to understand the battle space more quickly, so that they can speed up the decision-making process.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On the Bowman issue, it has been put to me that there has been some difficulty in communicating across hilly terrain. I understand that in those circumstances a high frequency channel will be used. This is a technical question and the Secretary of State may not have the answer at his fingertips, but, broadly speaking, is he satisfied that Bowman will deliver what he imagined it would?

Mr. Hoon: Recently I had an update on the arrangements for Bowman. The progress on introducing the system is extremely good and I am confident that we will resolve any technical difficulties as they arise. I am confident that this will be an extremely successful operation for UK armed forces.

To return to improvements provided by network-enabled capabilities, we need to match improved sensor performance and information exchange with a more decisive delivery of effect. During the Kosovo campaign, as recently as 1999, around 25 per cent. of munitions that the RAF used were precision-guided. Barely four years later, during Operation Telic, 85 per cent. of munitions used by the RAF were precision-guided. By taking advantage of such significant progress in the use of high technology, we will be better placed to ensure that our platforms are used to greatest effect and that the coherence of our military capabilities is enhanced.

If we are to have truly expeditionary forces, able to deploy quickly to deliver effect at significant distance from the United Kingdom, we need to rebalance our force structures. We must ensure that we can move our armed forces quickly to where they are needed with equipment that enables them to carry out the tasks we expect of them. The introduction of the future rapid effects system group of vehicles will provide our armed forces with battle-winning equipment that can be moved quickly by strategic airlift. As part of this rebalancing process, we have already been able to announce plans for a new light brigade, and the reduction of one armoured brigade—from three to two. This will enhance our existing light forces by offering a third choice in addition to 3 Commando and 16 Air Assault Brigade. Whenever such advances have been made in modernising defence equipment or capability it has always been necessary to make adjustments in the number of older platforms. It is right that we do this to ensure that our armed forces are properly equipped to meet the challenges of the future.

Mr. Blunt: In announcing the changes that will follow from, one hopes, the extra money that the Chancellor may make available in the comprehensive spending review and the extremely challenging long-term costings process or work strands process that is going on in the Department now, which appears to be on twice the scale of "Front Line First" of 10 years ago, there will plainly be some significant changes to follow the brigade changes that the Secretary of State has already indicated. How does he propose to announce the changes?

Mr. Hoon: I was about to deal with that point in my speech. In my statement on the publication of the White Paper last December, I set out to the House that I had asked the Ministry of Defence to undertake a significant examination of our capabilities and overheads. I anticipate that we will be in a position to make some announcement on the results of this work in the summer through the usual channels.

[Mr. Hoon]

The Government are committing significant extra financial resources to support changes envisaged in the White Paper. The 2002 spending review delivered the largest sustained increase in planned defence expenditure for more than 20 years—adding more than £3 billion over three years. Last week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed a further real-terms increase in the 2004 spending review. That does not mean we can afford to relax our efforts to use that money efficiently. In the challenging defence environment, we need to make every pound count.

Labour's record contrasts markedly with that of the Conservatives. During 18 years of government, the Tories imposed swingeing cuts in defence without any long-term strategic rationale. Spending was cut by nearly one third in real terms during the Tories' last 10 years in government.

There are always financial pressures on major Departments, especially during a demanding period. It is clear that the Conservative plan for a two-year freeze on defence spending would mean a £1.5 billion real terms cut in the unlikely event that the Tories returned to office. Members of the Opposition Front Bench need to come clean about how they plan to make that £1.5 billion cut. Will they withdraw British armed forces currently doing vital work in Iraq and Afghanistan? What part of the equipment programme would the Conservatives scrap—and what impact would that have on Britain's future defence capabilities and British industry?

Does the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) stand by his comments on the Radio 4 programme "Today" on 6 January, when he said:

"You can't do defence on the cheap"?

If so, why has the hon. Gentleman failed to explain that to his shadow Chancellor?

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): I am always suspicious when Ministers attack the Opposition. The Secretary of State said that the Chancellor had promised a real-terms increase. The right hon. Gentleman seeks specific answers from my hon. Friend, so will he tell the House what extra money the Chancellor has confirmed to him will be available?

Mr. Hoon: That announcement will be made in due course, as the spending totals for all Departments are made known. That process will take some months but that is not unusual. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) keenly questions spending on fast jets, for example. Conservatives talk about cuts in defence spending, while at the same time complaining about a series of projects that they want delivered. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to ask those same searching questions of members of his own Front Bench. Recognising the difficulties that face all Departments in meeting their budgetary commitments, how is that Conservative spokesmen believe that they can cut £1.5 billion from defence?

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Before the Secretary of State becomes more confused and tied up as he goes around in circles, I will clarify for the record that no one in the Conservative Opposition—including myself and the shadow Chancellor—has ever said that there will be a cut in defence spending.

Mr. Hoon: I do not believe everything that I read in the newspapers, but I read that the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex was less than enthusiastic about the shadow Chancellor's commitment. I will read out the words of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), just in case he has not told his hon. Friend the Opposition's spending plans. He said:

"I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues that the baseline for spending across all of these departmental budgets will be 0 per cent growth for the first two years, followed by 2 per cent growth per year for the remaining four years of the period covered by the strategy."

Everyone knows that zero per cent. growth is a cut in real terms of £1.5 billion—even before the extra money for defence committed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor at the time of the Budget is taken into account. The Conservatives plan a real-terms cut in the existing defence budget and an even bigger cut in our planned defence spending.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): Given General Sir Michael Walker's comment yesterday that it might be several years before Britain could undertake a major war operation, will the Secretary of State speculate by how much that period would be extended if the Ministry's budget was frozen in real terms during the first two years of a hypothetical Conservative Government?

Mr. Hoon: I look forward to the right hon. Member for Fylde asking that question of the shadow Cabinet spokesman for defence. We want to know where those cuts will be made. Will there be cuts in capability or in equipment? That is for the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex to explain.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the problems facing our armed forces today originate in decisions taken in 1992, 1993 and 1994 by the last Conservative Government? Does my right hon. Friend further agree with the comments of the First Sea Lord to the Defence Select Committee yesterday, who said that stopping recruitment had been a dreadful mistake and had led to a black hole—particularly in respect of leading hands. Does he agree that we are having to pick up those mistakes now?

Mr. Hoon: The previous Government's lack of spending on public services had a dramatic effect on hospitals and schools. The dramatic effect on defence was not always appreciated. We had to make good many of the cuts and shortfalls that we inherited. Year by year, we are doing that by spending more on defence—so it is right to highlight the cuts proposed in the unlikely event of the Conservatives again achieving power.

Mr. Jack: Given events at the time in eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and beyond, was it irresponsible of the last Conservative Government to react to the rapidly changing defence scenario and to adjust Britain's defence capabilities to new threats and scenarios—as the Secretary of State is doing in the world of today?

Mr. Hoon: Would the right hon. Gentleman say that it was irresponsible of members of his own Front Bench to announce a cut in defence expenditure at precisely the time more needs to be spent, to provide security against threats? I look forward to the right hon. Gentleman questioning his own Front Benchers about their commitments. The right hon. Gentleman regularly urges the Government to spend more on fast jets and military equipment. There ought to be some consistency. I would be delighted to know the right hon. Gentleman's position.

Mr. Jack: I come to the House to ask the Secretary of State, on behalf of my constituents working in the aerospace industry, to honour the commitments and budgets that he has promised to programmes such as the Eurofighter and joint strike fighter.

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted that in the context of the extra spending that we have promised, a range of successful military equipment will be available to support Britain's armed forces. I want to know the kinds of cuts and the equipment that the Conservatives will cancel in the event of the right hon. Gentleman supporting his own Front Benchers' efforts to reduce defence expenditure.

Mr. John Smith: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: I had better carry on. There is a limit to how much fun one can have in one day.

The campaign in Iraq began just over one year ago. It showed our armed forces and the Ministry of Defence at their best and demonstrated how far we have come in achieving truly expeditionary forces able to deliver a range of military attacks over long distances. I have acknowledged that there were some deficiencies, but I welcome the thorough investigations by the National Audit Office and the Defence Select Committee, which have helped to illuminate the issues.

I have no doubt that Britain's intervention in Iraq has been and will continue to be beneficial to the Iraqi people. Earlier this month, members of Iraq's governing council signed a transitional administrative law for Iraq. That signing was a significant milestone.

Given the uncertainties of the modern world, standing still on defence policy is not an option. We must not fail our armed forces. We must ensure that they are structured and equipped to carry out the tasks and challenges that we expect them to face. The White Paper provides the policy basis on which we will rebalance our armed forces, to ensure that they are best placed to meet the security challenges of the first part of the 21st century. The White Paper recognises that to be an effective and influential player in a changing world, the United Kingdom must be committed to working in partnership with our international friends and allies and be prepared to take action when needed. By doing so, we shall together confront the threats presented by international terrorism, weapons of mass destruction and the challenges posed by failed and failing states.

The White Paper recognises also that we cannot predict precisely where and when we will next have to deploy significant numbers of UK armed forces in support of our foreign policy and security aim. We must modernise our force structures and harness technology and information networks to enable the UK to act quickly, accurately and decisively anywhere in the world.

2.29 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I wish first to apologise to the House, as I have already done to the Secretary of State and the Minister of State, because I will be unable to be present for the winding-up speeches. I have an important speaking engagement, and I apologise for my absence.

I also thank the Secretary of State for his generous and warm tribute to my noble and gallant Friend Lord Vivian, who played such a distinguished part in defence debates in the other place for many years. He was extremely knowledgeable and very popular on both sides of the House. He was highly regarded and respected for his knowledge. We will miss his advice and considerable experience as a serving soldier—at the rank of Brigadier when he retired—and we extend our deepest sympathy to his wife and family.

I also wish to pay a warm tribute to the men and women of the three armed services for the wonderful way in which they have carried out their duties in the past onerous year, and for the patience and fortitude of their families—qualities that are often over-tested at present. I also pay warm tribute to our reserve forces, which have played a distinguished and remarkable role in operations in the recent past, and continue to do so. We salute their efforts and are grateful to them, their families and their employers for their understanding. Finally, I pay warm tribute to the civilian staff of the Ministry of Defence, wherever they work, for the remarkable and important work that they do to support our armed forces.

Even allowing for the Secretary of State for Defence having a bit of fun at my expense—which was entirely legitimate—it defies belief, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) pointed out, that the Secretary of State should think that the end of the cold war required no strategic reduction in the posture and shape of our armed forces: it was one of the biggest changes in military affairs for generations. However, it is a matter of common consent throughout the world that the peace dividend taken in many countries at the end of the cold war was probably overdone. It did represent a significant change from positional defence to the evolving policies that have found catharsis, in many ways, in the White Paper, including the creation of highly deployable forces, which was started in the last years of the Conservative Government and in which the present Government have made substantial and welcome investment.

We generally accept the White Paper's assessment of the strategic environment and the difficulties that flow from it. Indeed, it is clear that we have come to a decisive moment in history, when a new and diverse constellation of threats have appeared that are not nearly as obvious as their relatively certain predecessors. Today, we are confronted by an extra-national, religiously self-defined entity with something ominously like a nation's power to wage war. Terrorist outrages in New York, Riyadh, Istanbul and Madrid—I join the Secretary of State in extending our condolences to the people of Spain following that dreadful atrocity—are a horrific reminder of the new challenges we face, and the clear duty that the Government have to ensure that we are fully prepared to cope with such a disaster.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman deals with the issue in a statesmanlike way, but does he not think that it was opportunistic of the shadow Foreign Secretary to criticise the Prime Minister for meeting Colonel Gaddafi in an attempt to reduce the threat to which refers? That is particularly true given that my right hon. Friend's intention in that regard was announced last December and welcomed by the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Secretary of State for Defence. Was not that condemnation ridiculous political opportunism by the shadow Foreign Secretary?

Mr. Soames: From one statesman to another, I must say that, unusually, I am in deep but respectful disagreement with the right hon. Gentleman. All of us welcome the developments taking place in Libya, but the meeting may turn out to be premature. We welcome those developments and it is right that recognition should be given to Libya for the steps that have been taken. However, as so often, some of the language is overdone and the visit may be premature. That was the point that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) was trying to make.

While that uniquely threatening form of terrorism must be effectively engaged, we must also address the deeper and abiding reasons for its very existence. That will be a major duty for the Government in years to come. In the new strategic environment, as the Secretary of State said, homeland defence is of the first importance. Traditionally, our armed forces focused on deterrence, stability, and war-fighting missions in overseas theatres. The home front was regarded as a rear area, not a front line, and the job of securing it was primarily a task for civilian agencies, with the exception of Northern Ireland. However, the new strategic environment reaffirms the role of the Government as protector of the country against foreign aggression, and so defence of our homeland represents one of the primary tasks of the MOD and must receive the level of attention and co-ordination that it deserves. Indeed, as the White Paper states, our forces are expected to "protect our citizens at home and counter international terrorism across the globe".

It is clear that a fundamental shift in the mindset of the MOD decision makers will be required—a shift of which, incidentally, there was precious little evidence in the White Paper.

An evolving national strategy for homeland security requires that the MOD may have to consider the employment of military forces in ways previously considered outside the scope of operations. What specific training are the armed forces undergoing in order to be able to respond to what the Metropolitan Police Commissioner suggested would be an "inevitable" attack on London? Furthermore, can the Minister comment on the level of co-ordination established since 2001 between the MOD, the Home Office and other Departments?

Mr. Kevan Jones: I agree with the emphasis that the hon. Gentleman places on the threat to the homeland and the need for extra vigilance and expenditure on that. Can he explain how a future Conservative Government would meet that threat when bound by the straitjacket imposed by the shadow Chancellor?

Mr. Soames: I shall continue my speech, if I may.

The tasks imposed on our armed forces will continue to be more and more onerous. It is clear from the Prime Minister's speech in Sedgefield that they could become even more so, but I have read the evidence that the Chief of the Defence Staff gave to the Defence Committee yesterday and it is difficult to see how the armed forces could cope.

The Government's definition of Britain's interests has continued to widen over the past seven years. The Government have deployed our forces on major operations four times in the past five years, and we continue to have major obligations in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as maintaining a considerable presence in the Balkans, which was recently reinforced by the Spearhead battalion as a theatre reserve force. As the Chief of the Defence Staff made plain yesterday, those operations are making near impossible demands on our troops.

The White Paper states that

"we must extend our ability to project force further afield than the SDR envisaged."

Given the extraordinary demands being made on the services, the Government have a first duty to our servicemen and women to realise that it is they who will have to deliver success and that they will need to be reassured as to the direction of the Government's policies. I find that there exists at present a great sense of uncertainty and unease among our armed forces, who I am afraid feel very much taken for granted and increasingly believe that they are not properly supported, resourced or looked after. That is a serious message for the Government.

Mike Gapes: Given the great pressures to which the hon. Gentleman has referred and in the context of a possible standstill budget, in which of the areas in the world where we are currently deploying forces to assist international peace and security would he make cuts?

Mr. Soames: If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself, I shall come to that point later in my speech.

In discussing the White Paper and the application of the new doctrines, especially the network-enabled capability, it is essential that we do not forget the need for balance between old and new concepts, a point that was powerfully made in a distinguished and important speech, which I commend to the Secretary of State, by General Lord Guthrie in the House of Lords yesterday.

The lessons, from the Balkans to Basra, must be remembered. Infantry and armour on the ground can be augmented by technological wizardry but they cannot be replaced by it. The peace in Basra and in the Balkans is being kept by thousands of soldiers on the ground, so can the Secretary of State confirm that, given the exceptional tempo of operations at present, he has no intention of cutting back the number of infantry regiments? In our judgment, those regiments are sorely needed.

We welcome acknowledgement of the need to continue robust and collective military training at all levels. That is one of the lessons about which the Select Committee has raised concern. Its report states:

"The high number of operations which UK service personnel have been involved in has had an adverse impact on their training."

Reductions in training have a progressively damaging effect on fighting power, particularly at the highest level—joint combined arms collective training at formation level and above. It may indeed take years to recover fully standards and capabilities that have been lost.

The problem is truly serious and the Government must rectify it. If they do not do so, sooner or later it will lead to disaster and to the creation of lesser, more ordinary, armed forces. It is becoming clear that many who went to fight in Iraq did not have adequate training; for example, during pre-conflict training there was a restriction on track mileage for armoured vehicles. That seems an unacceptable state of affairs.

The Secretary of State must acknowledge that training saves lives. Many deployments involve considerable danger and it is unacceptable that our people do not have enough time to prepare for them properly and thoroughly. Such risks are unacceptable, but they are becoming frequent. I look to the Secretary of State to put that right.

Mr. John Smith: I am not sure that the emphasis of the hon. Gentleman's point is clear. Is he saying that there is no need for additional investment in C4ISTAR—command, control, communications, computers and intelligence, surveillance, target acquisition and reconnaissance—without which we cannot operate as a modern force?

Mr. Soames: I think a lot of things are unclear to the hon. Gentleman, but that was not the point I was making. I was saying that there is an absolute requirement for thorough and professional training before troops are committed.

The services cannot buy in experience. Under the current pressures, individuals at more junior levels are unable to achieve the career progression to which they aspire. The result is that, over a period of time, technical standards slip. Can the Secretary of State comment on reports that about 50 per cent. of combat arms training has been cut back owing to funding problems? Can he assess the impact of that on the armed forces' capabilities?

Overstretch has been a recurring theme for the armed forces in recent years. When I was Minister of State for the Armed Forces, the then Labour Opposition chided me in relation to overstretch but at that time the Army was only about a quarter as committed as it is nowadays. With overseas deployments coming thick and fast and the overall size of the armed forces in decline, overstretch is a recurring and fundamentally important problem. Indeed, it is only a slight exaggeration to say that most of the UK Army is either on deployment, returning from deployment or getting ready to go.

Last year, the MOD announced that 40,842 personnel were expected to be stationed abroad during 2004, representing about 40 per cent. of trained strength. That is, of course, leading to increasing problems with tour lengths. In February, the Secretary of State admitted that the Government had wholly failed to meet that target. What has been done to address that issue?

The armed forces have recently become grossly overstretched by the number and scale of their deployments. That simply cannot go on, as the Chief of the Defence Staff implied when he appeared before the Select Committee yesterday. As the Defence Committee report rightly states:

"The Government must recognise that the armed forces are simply not large enough to sustain the pattern of operational deployment since the Strategic Defence Review permanently without serious risk of damage to their widely admired professional standards."

What is the Secretary of State's response to the evidence of the Chief of the Defence Staff to the Committee last night? He warned that a large operation of the size of Telic would not be practical until we approach the end of this decade. The Opposition believe that to be a sign of Labour's fundamental lack of effective stewardship of the armed forces.

Mr. Davidson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is an odd juxtaposition of policy to say that the Government are committing the armed forces to too many duties while saying that his answer would be to cut expenditure to a lower level than the Government intend?

Mr. Soames: I realise that the hon. Gentleman has the most serious difficulty in understanding even the simplest things; I have already told the House that neither I, nor the shadow Chancellor nor anyone else has talked of a cut in the defence budget.

May I turn to equipment and procurement? Let us have a look at the state of the Government's procurement policy on new technology. Despite the much vaunted, and, in fairness, welcome, defence industrial policy set out by the Secretary of State in October 2002, the Government have failed to apply it coherently to their procurement programme. An uncertain and anxious defence industry has been given no strategic steer by the Government about the essential capabilities that they believe the UK must retain. The cornerstone of their policy, introduced under the SDR, was smart procurement. That lasted a couple of years before being reinvented as "smart acquisition". Smart acquisition? Tell that to the trade unions that joined us in fighting tooth and nail to persuade the Government to buy the British Hawk advanced jet trainer. It was so smart a process that they placed an order just hours before 500 employees of BAE Systems were due to be handed their redundancy notices. Tell that to the work force in Telford, who for the past two years have been anxiously awaiting a decision from the Government on the future rapid effects system battlefield vehicle that the Chief of the General Staff requires to be in service by 2009, but for which there is not yet even a drawing. Tell that to BAE and Thales who read about the MOD's intention to take command of the aircraft carrier programme. Tell that to the National Audit Office, which found that Ministers failed to order sufficient stocks of kit for the Iraq war to be delivered in time. "Just in time" became in too many cases "Just too late".

[Mr. Soames]

Clare Short: This is not a popular position, but I think that we need to review our commitment to procure only from British defence companies. When there are procurement problems, there is less of a case for procuring only domestically. If we want our armed forces to have the best radios, the best rifles—the best equipment—we should move away from that absolute commitment to British Aerospace and the inefficiency in our procurement systems. What does the hon. Gentleman say to that?

Mr. Soames: I say that procurement is indeed a difficult process. However, we have a magnificent defence industry, which employs hundreds of thousands of people and is an enormous export earner. Of course, we should support British industry, but at the end of the day there is no strategic vision as to how that should be done. We propose to develop a proper strategic vision and provide real leadership for an industrial policy on procurement that will make sense.

The procurement budget is more than £3 billion overspent this year alone, and not just on the so-called legacy programmes for which the Government have been responsible for managing for the past seven years. There is a huge bow-wave of projects building up whose affordability is increasingly questioned. Programmes continue to slip, and worst of all, across the board significant gaps in capability are being actively planned for. Nothing better illustrates that than the maritime air cover problem, whereby the Government are gambling that we shall be able to get away with no such independent cover between 2006 and 2012 at the earliest.

Most chilling of all is the Government's language on platforms—tanks, ships and aircraft to the British public. Last summer, we were told that platform numbers would not be so important in the brave new world of effects-based warfare. Now, we are told that platform numbers will be cut to make way for investment in network-enabled capability. The truth is that numbers remain critical. The White Paper refers to the increased frequency and duration of operations. The Prime Minister alluded to all those ideas in his very important speech in Sedgefield. I can tell the Secretary of State that we need those platforms to undertake the number and scale of operations envisaged by the Government's policy. Ships, planes, armour and men cannot be in two places at the same time.

Mr. Jack: Did my hon. Friend notice that the Secretary of State did not comment once on any of the programmes to which my hon. Friend has referred? As a result, does he share my deep suspicion about precisely what the future holds for many of the programmes about which the Secretary of State failed to make any remark in his address?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for pointing that out—I intend to deal with some of those points in greater detail—and I share his anxiety. The Secretary of State started off with a dignified and an important speech on defence that degenerated into a rather futile and pointless knockabout.

The White Paper is full of buzz words and phrases, but the truth comes out only in the following statement, which will interest my right hon. Friend:

> "We will not be able to hold on to platforms or force elements that do not have the flexibility to meet the demands of future operations."

On the face of it, that is a sensible remark, but the Government make no effort to spell out which platforms or elements we will not be able to hold on to, even though if they have been identified, the cuts must have been identified, too. Can the Secretary of State clarify which platforms or force elements we will not be able to hold on to? If we are to have a proper discussion on the White Paper—the debate is meant to be about the White Paper—the Secretary of State will have to clarify the details of which platforms and force elements are involved, and we will want to debate that with him most vigorously. I note that he is to come to the House to announce the cuts that he intends to make in summer, and I hope that he will then be able to tell us which cuts he must make as a result of the new strategy in the White Paper.

Specifically, I call on the Secretary of State to confirm the informed speculation that the Type 45 destroyer procurement will be cut by a third. Is it true that tranche 3 of the Eurofighter Typhoon project will be cut? It is clear that mismanagement and indecision by the Ministry of Defence about the future aircraft carrier programme is seriously delaying the project and leading to a substantial waste of funds. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but it is well known already that the carriers will be one and a half years late. Is the objective of having two 65,000 tonne ships, each capable of carrying some 50 aircraft, to be met, and what is the new time scale? The MOD is wasting money and time through a lack of any strategic leadership on those projects and it must provide the House with urgent clarification on the management of those major procurement programmes.

We welcome the intention to enhance the strategic enablers of communication, logistics and intelligence—that may be the point that the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) was groping at through the fog that surrounds him—but as a former Chief of the Defence Staff, Lord Guthrie, rightly pointed out recently:

> "It is important that we do not concentrate our efforts to too great an extent on one emerging threat—a knee-jerk reaction—forgetting that there are other threats which have not gone away for which we should still be prepared."

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will pay the closest attention to what Lord Guthrie and Lord Boyce had to say in two very important speeches in the Lords yesterday. We believe that such principles are of the first importance. Indeed, the most recent events in Kosovo furnish excellent lessons in that regard.

Mr. Hoon: The implication of all that the hon. Gentleman has been setting out to the House is that, if the Conservatives were returned to power, they would retain all our existing equipment and buy all the equipment that we propose to buy and that they would do so on the basis of all the previous plans set out, presumably by Conservatives in government. Has it ever crossed his mind that, in the face of a cut in the amount that the Conservatives are planning to spend, his figures simply do not add up?

Mr. Soames: For the record, the only people making cuts are the Government, and I am glad that I managed to get the right hon. Gentleman's head up so I could say that. I would like to say that he is like an old pike, but in fact he is like a rather fat trout, hiding in the weeds. It seems that I have to cast a particularly delectable fly over his nose before I can get him up, but I am glad I have done so. There are substantial cuts, and 14 separate strands of work are under way in the MOD to secure £1.5 billion in savings. That will do great harm to capabilities and to people's capacity to do their duty.

Mr. Keetch rose—

Mr. Blunt: While we are on the subject of money, it might be as well for the House to remember that the Government imposed a cut of £500 million a year in the defence budget in their first comprehensive spending review—cumulatively, that will now be £3 billion—and that the so-called increase in the subsequent defence review will be £2.5 billion at the end of that period, so the Government have been responsible for a net cut in defence expenditure on that which they inherited.

Mr. Soames: Precisely. I suggest that the Secretary of State pay attention to what my hon. Friend says. He is a well-informed member of the Select Committee, and is absolutely right. Another issue that we must address is that of acquiring the technology necessary for the network-enabled capability. The baseline for Labour's defence policy was the 1998 strategic defence review, which, as we all know, was never properly funded. Many of the funding problems that face defence today are a direct consequence of Labour's failure in that regard, as my hon. Friend pointed out.

The Government have asked our armed forces to carry out more and more commitments, without adequate resources. At times, it has been extremely difficult for Parliament to discover the details that relate to the defence budget, as the Government have gone in for their usual practice of re-announcing old money. For the second year in succession, the Comptroller and Auditor General has refused to sign off the MOD's resources and accounts budget.

When the Secretary of State published the defence White Paper in December last year, there were said to be no resource implications. Since then, we have discovered that the MOD is undertaking 14 work strands to identify capabilities to reduce or cut, which will provide savings of £1.5 billion. I understand that those cuts will be announced in the spring. The very underhand way in which the Secretary of State is going around making those cuts is to be deplored, and we look forward to an opportunity becoming available for him to clarify and give us transparency about where he is looking and what the effects will be on the capabilities of the armed forces.

Against the background of that failure adequately to fund defence while at the same time increasing commitments, the Conservative Party must plan for the future. We believe that our front-line armed forces must be, and will be, a fundamental priority and that they must have sufficient resources adequately to fulfil their duties and extensive commitments. When we announce our detailed spending plans later in the year, we will make clear how we intend to shift money to the front line to maintain and enhance our defence capabilities.

Of course the consequences of more deployments and fewer resources are obvious in the serious deficiencies that have emerged during and after the completion of Operation Telic. The NAO and Select Committee reports have rightly highlighted the brilliant achievements of our troops and the great success that they achieved. However, both reports were also highly critical of equipment shortages that could have had disastrous consequences for the 46,000 British servicemen and women who were deployed.

In the defence debate last year, the Secretary of State said:

> "I want to reassure the House and the country that British personnel deployed on operations will be properly equipped by the Ministry of Defence, and fully capable of fulfilling the tasks that may be required of them. They will be properly equipped to deal with the environmental conditions that they face. The Ministry of Defence has long had contracts in place to ensure that sufficient stocks of desert clothing and boots are available quickly."

He went on:

> "The protection of our troops is an absolute priority. Contrary to press speculation, our ability to protect and operate in a nuclear, biological or chemical environment is second to none. Our training and equipment mean that we are prepared to meet this threat if necessary, and make a proportionately serious response should anyone use such weapons against us."—[Official Report, 22 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 336–7.]

That was far from the reality on the ground. The Defence Committee report has found that those assurances were fundamentally unreliable and wholly inaccurate.

Mr. Keetch rose—

Mr. Soames: Commanders were unaware of where equipment was stored; plates for enhanced ceramic body armour "disappeared" and never got to the right units; and vital biological and chemical equipment was "deemed unserviceable". Not enough desert clothing and equipment was available on time, and many people did not even receive their desert combats until the war was over. There was not enough ammunition, nor were there enough chemical protection suits. The Secretary of State shakes his head, but these are very serious matters. As the Committee report states:

> "Given the potential threat posed by Iraqi armed forces, sufficient chemical warfare detection and protection were particularly important for this operation."

I again urge the Secretary of State to reread the MOD account of the brilliant assault on the al-Faw peninsula by 3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines. It states that

[Mr. Soames]

"as final preparations were made on 20 March in the tactical assembly area to launch the assault, there had been attacks by Iraqi missiles. The Brigade fully expected to be subjected to chemical attack and the helicopters to be engaged by air defence artillery."

The brigade was not subjected to a chemical attack. The report suggests:

"It was fortuitous that service personnel did not suffer as a consequence, but had the Iraqis used chemical weapons systematically, as employed in the Iran-Iraq war the operational consequences would have been severe . . . the lack of armoured vehicle filters seems to us to be a matter of the utmost seriousness."

For the information of the House, let me just say that the 7th Armoured Bridge fought through Iraq in a war allegedly to remove the threat of chemical and biological weapons without having on any one of its tanks the chemical weapons filters that were required. They did not arrive until after the war was over. That is a fundamental and deeply serious failing. It is not acceptable.

In the Iraq campaign—I want the Secretary of State to listen to this—the Government came very close to breaking the bond of trust that they have with their soldiers. He should not underestimate the effect of those shortages on the morale of the soldiers. This must not happen again, and the Government stand guilty as charged of very grave deficiencies that should have been overcome long ago. For an Army that has deployed four times in five years not to have the ability effectively and efficiently to deliver the logistics supply chain to its troops in the front line is frankly unforgivable.

I apologise for having spoken for so long, but I wish to say something about NATO. The White Paper rightly states:

"The UK recognises the pre-eminence of NATO".

We all agree with that, and I heard what the Secretary of State said. However, the security and stability of Europe and the maintenance of the transatlantic relationship are fundamental to our defence. The most logical way of responding to the 21st century threat would be through NATO as the primary military organisation. However, NATO's primacy has now been somewhat compromised. Since the St. Malo declaration, European Governments have spent scarce defence funds and considerable political effort on developing the structures of the European security and defence policy while operational capabilities—which the British public are repeatedly told will be improved by European Union defence—have continued to decline inexorably. That has led to our having grave reservations about Europe's plans to undertake a new defence initiative that involves duplicating the planning and command structures of NATO.

We do not need and we cannot afford to duplicate NATO's structure. There is nothing that Europe wants to do that cannot be done by using NATO's command and planning structures. The Conservative party supports greater co-operation between European countries on defence, but it should take place within the framework of NATO. Europe should not seek to create a defence structure as an alternative to NATO or as a counterweight to the United States.

The Secretary of State needs to be aware that the Government are in grave danger of undermining the resilience, the morale and the good will of our armed forces. These are the three cornerstones of all military success. The Government need to nurture them, and to nurture them with great care and attention through some very difficult times ahead.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 15-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

3.6 pm

Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): When I first heard that a defence White Paper was to be published, my immediate reaction was to ask why. What was the purpose? After all, we had the comprehensive strategic defence review five years ago, and the SDR new chapter in 2002. The issues that the White Paper deals with, such as network-enabled capability and security challenges, have been subject to widespread debate in defence circles for some time. Why did we need another paper? Was it, as the media speculated and Opposition Members said, to give a policy framework to a hidden agenda for drastic cuts in defence spending?

I was certainly reassured by the Chancellor's Budget statement last week. He said:

"In the last spending review, we allocated the largest spending increase in 20 years to defence, and I can tell the House that I propose real terms increases in defence spending in the coming round."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 333.]

That statement provides a stark contrast to the Conservatives' plans to freeze and—whether they like to admit it or not—to cut defence spending in real terms by £1.5 billion from 2005–06 to 2007–08. Cuts were carried out during their 18 years in government and, although they can talk about the cold war and the need to meet new requirements and demands on our forces, I, as the Member of Parliament for Dunfermline, West, will never forget the way in which they blatantly wasted more than £300 million of public money when they took submarine refitting from Rosyth dockyard and awarded it to Devonport for what it seems clear were merely political, and not defence and security, interests.

On defence spending, I am also reassured by the views expressed by the Chief of the Defence Staff, General Walker. In his lecture to the Royal United Services Institute in 2003, he made it clear that he welcomed the defence White Paper and considered that it was a long time coming. Yesterday, he said that, although he and his fellow Chiefs of Staff had not seen the details of future defence spending, they were enthusiastic about it. Many of us hope that we, too, will be enthusiastic when the details are revealed. My commitment, and that of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members, is to ensure that implementation of the White Paper does not in any way diminish the high standards and professionalism of the United Kingdom's armed forces, but maintains and builds on their considerable and internationally renowned achievements. I join others in paying tribute to our armed forces and their families.

The defence White Paper raises issues that we could debate for at least a week, but in the time available I will raise just three, possibly four. The first is the importance of relevant training and adequate time off for it. There is the training required not only by individuals but by companies and battalions. There is the training required to deliver jointery—effective operations by all three services. There is the training needed to operate effectively in multilateral alliances. There is the training demanded by network-enabled capabilities and the trend towards more frequent, small to medium-scale operations. Then there is the training needed for both war fighting and peacekeeping.

When commitments are high, as they currently are, a balancing act is often required to ensure that people are available for relevant training, and even more so when it involves overseas training, such as exercise Saif Sareea, which everyone agrees was essential, in terms of the lessons learned and experience gained, for the success of our troops in Operation Telic. I want an assurance from the Minister that the White Paper will not seek to reduce either training or recruitment. My impression is that we need to maintain our current force numbers and indeed to reach our recruitment targets if we are to enable time to be available for proper training, as well as for the home and family, in between all the demands of operational commitments.

I join in the sympathies that have been expressed to the family of Lord Vivian. I read his excellent contribution to the other place's defence debate on the White Paper in January, when he made the important point that 72 per cent. of the MOD's 350 planned exercises in a year were cancelled because of increased operational activity. I express my sympathy to his family. I hope that that demonstrates that his influence and knowledge will certainly long be remembered in this place.

It concerns me that I have heard that recruitment, particularly the surge in interest from the general public in the past 12 months, has been held back because of the demand and extra cost of training. I hope to hear the Minister say, if that is the case, that it is being effectively tackled.

I emphasise the importance of core training, of acquiring basic skills, of developing individual service identities, and of building loyalty and commitment to a band of brothers, to a regiment and to a service. They are a vital part of the standards and professionalism of our armed forces. However good the technology, it needs a strong team to make it work and to make it effective. Only a strong team can overcome the unforeseen and unpredictable nature of war fighting and peacekeeping.

That leads me to the second issue: network-enabled capabilities and the full range of training needed for them. The White Paper sees them as crucial to the rapid delivery of military effect, yet I raise some notes of caution which I have picked up, particularly from an article in the RUSI Journal by General John McColl, which is linked to my concern that technology cannot be a substitute for people and their skills and training. He points out that the battlefield is already an information-rich environment where poor connectivity and bad management of information can confuse rather than assist the commander. Indeed, I, and I think other members of the Defence Committee, have heard some stories in respect of operations in Afghanistan involving our forces and US forces. General McColl says in respect of information:

"knowing what is important and what is not, what is urgent and what is not, is essentially a human skill, unlikely to diminish in its importance, irrespective of the quality and quantity of information that NEC will deliver."

I do not think that any of us wants the development of human skills to take second place to technology. I have a concern that at times our major allies, the US forces, tend towards over-reliance on technology, perhaps neglecting the basic skills that are such a core part of armed forces.

In the time available, I will not carry on with what I was going to say on network-enabled capabilities, but will mention the third issue, which is my concern about what the defence White Paper says on naval and maritime capability and equipment. The House would be surprised if I did not mention Rosyth dockyard in my constituency at some point in a defence debate. Therefore, I declare a particular interest, which has been reinforced by taking part in the armed forces parliamentary scheme with the senior service, as it likes to be referred to.

I am concerned by the blunt statement in the White Paper that reductions in the numbers of our naval fleet "will be necessary." The future of the 1,800 people employed at Rosyth dockyard depends on work available from the naval fleet, particularly the future aircraft carrier. They have demonstrated time and again their ability to take on changes and challenges and to deliver on cost and on time.

I cannot resist responding to the remark by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) earlier about looking to take some defence manufacturing work away from the UK. I have always argued and will continue to argue that all our royal naval ships and submarines should be built, refitted and repaired in the UK and nowhere else.

Tribute is not always paid, as it should be, to the part that the Royal Navy plays. That was clearly demonstrated in Operation Telic. The Royal Fleet Auxiliary Service provided essential fuel, supplies, equipment and food. The navy provided support and transported our troops to shore. It cleared mines from the waters and channels around Um Qasr, so that not only troops and equipment but humanitarian food and relief could be provided. Whatever the changes in our security environment, an island nation needs a strong navy to deal with the terrorist threats that we face to our ports and harbours, and a strong navy that can go anywhere in the world to provide command and control, and to supply the troops who are required.

I do not have time to talk about NATO and the European Union, but I am sure that they will be debated another day. Overall, I welcome the White Paper and the opportunity that it provides to discuss many issues that are key to our future defence and security. I pay tribute to the progress that has been made so far, but there is a long way to go, and I hope that we shall have many more opportunities to debate key aspects of the White Paper. It contains many right words, but it is short on detail and on the action to come, so we should have the chance to discuss them in coming months.

Our armed forces have led the way in responding to the changes and challenges brought by the end of the cold war, the threats posed by international terrorism, and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

[Rachel Squire]

Let us ensure that the White Paper and its implementation maintain their high standards and reward the armed forces and all who play a part in the defence and security of our country by setting an agenda that they and, in turn, the rest of the world are proud to follow.

3.21 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire), who speaks on defence matters, especially naval issues, with such skill. I shall write to her about my visit to Rosyth in a few weeks, to which I look forward eagerly. Like her, I pay tribute to the armed forces parliamentary scheme, in which I, too, participated with the senior service, albeit in a different year from her. I was with the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard), who was present in the Chamber until recently. The scheme is of great benefit to many people.

I join the hon. Lady and the Secretary of State in paying tribute to the late Brigadier Lord Vivian, whom I met when I first entered Parliament. The then Secretary of State was keen to encourage new Back Benchers with defence interests to get involved, and I accompanied Lord Vivian on several trips with the Lords defence study group. I remember the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) and me accompanying Lord Vivian to see warships in a base in the western isles. Lord Vivian was always courteous and generous in sharing his knowledge with members of other parties. He will be greatly missed.

I associate myself with the Secretary of State's comments about the terrible events in Madrid. For all of us, they have reinforced the recognition that the main threat to the United Kingdom is now from international terrorism. We must commit ourselves to the campaign against that. On that issue, the Liberal Democrats concur 100 per cent. with the Government.

I see the Under-Secretary of State for Defence on the Treasury Bench. Yesterday, he and I debated the reserve forces. It seems that defence debates are like London buses: there is none for ages, then two come along at once. The Government have been good, however, in scheduling regular defence debates, and I commend them on that. I also commend the White Paper, which contains much with which we agree.

Britain enjoys a unique position in being able to project power to enhance the security of the United Kingdom and the world in troubled areas. We should guard that ability at all costs. I pay tribute to British forces—and their families—who are undertaking brave work in reconstruction in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo. In recent weeks, we have seen the real threat that our soldiers face in Kosovo.

I pay special tribute to the forces in Afghanistan. We hear little of what they are doing—indeed, a Territorial Army soldier in my constituency who returned from Afghanistan a couple of months ago told me that the forces there sometimes feel like a forgotten army. We should record our thanks for their service in the continued hunt for bin Laden and other terrorists. Such work is crucial to our defence. The threat from terrorism has never been far from our minds in recent days, and the armed forces have a significant role to play in tackling that threat. In Afghanistan, where, it is reported, the Taliban and al-Qaeda have enjoyed a resurgence this year, it is important to maintain our commitment.

The international security assistance force now has a much wider mandate in that country, but lacks sufficient troops to stabilise it. Will the Minister tell us whether there is a timetable for the deployment of more UK forces as part of the NATO forces in Afghanistan; and will he give a commitment that those forces will be found if they are required? The Liberal Democrats have an underlying commitment to NATO, and we are grateful for its work in the difficult environment of Afghanistan.

Mr. Dalyell: What number of troops would be sufficient? We are talking about the north-west frontier, whose history suggests that "sufficient troops" means tens of thousands.

Mr. Keetch: The Father of the House is absolutely right. I was suggesting not that such troops be drawn solely from British forces, but that we play our part as part of NATO. I suspect that during the Iraq crisis, he and I were both concerned about the unfinished business of Afghanistan. We know from our own history how difficult that country is to deal with, and I believe—I suspect that he and others do, too—that sorting out Afghanistan ought to be our No. 1 priority. That concern formed part of the arguments that the Liberal Democrats advanced 12 months ago.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although Afghanistan is a priority, it is part of a picture in which the middle east is also a priority? That picture runs from poppy growing in Afghanistan through to Turkey and Kosovo, where the shipments are split up and sent into the drug distribution networks. That is why the matter is becoming a strategic issue, rather than simply a frictional issue.

Mr. Keetch: The hon. Gentleman is right. Events in Afghanistan—poppy growing and terrorism—have a far more profound impact on the security of the United Kingdom and our constituents than events in other countries in the region with which the Government chose to deal.

Our forces in Iraq continue to perform sterling work. Let me make one thing absolutely clear: although my party and I voted against the war 12 months ago, we do not believe that it would be right now to withdraw British troops unilaterally from Iraq. Yes, we want greater United Nation involvement and greater internationalisation of forces in Iraq, but as the occupying power, we have a responsibility to support the people of Iraq, and pulling our troops out now would be catastrophic.

However, I wish to raise a delicate issue relating to our forces in Iraq. One or two complaints have caused us concern, in particular, those regarding the death of Baha Musa and the alleged abuse of others in UK custody in Iraq. The Government have refused to hold an independent public inquiry into the matter, but holding some sort of inquiry might help to isolate the issue and reassure the Iraqis. In the face of continued Ministry of Defence intransigence, perhaps the Minister will at least undertake to make public the findings of any inquiry.

The practice of paying the families of those who suffer death or injury as a result of UK actions is also problematic. Upon receipt of such compensation, families sign a declaration waiving their right to make any future claim relating to the incident. There is a risk that that will not help to enhance the UK's image abroad. If the families have a case, perhaps that case should be heard in a court of law, and if further compensation is due, it should be paid. The MOD must treat the citizens of Iraq as we would treat those of the United Kingdom.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): If I understand the hon. Gentleman's position, it is that he opposed the war in the vote that was held in this House a year or so ago, but that he now supports the work that our forces are doing in Iraq. Does he or does he not believe that Iraq is a better place for the invasion?

Mr. Keetch: Iraqis are certainly better placed after the removal of Saddam Hussein. My party and I never said that we would rule out military action in all circumstances, but we believed that it was inappropriate to take military action before the UN process was complete. We also made it clear that if troops were deployed to the Gulf we would support our forces in the field. The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) criticised the kit given to British troops, but before the conflict it was the Liberal Democrats who raised the issue of kit for our servicemen. We, not Conservative Front Benchers, asked important questions about whether boots and equipment were suitable. At the time, it seemed that the Conservatives had signed up to military action long before the Government. They blindly supported President Bush in his endeavours regardless of the effect on our armed forces.

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman has still not answered the critical question—is Iraq a better place now than it was 18 months ago, yes or no?

Mr. Keetch: Of course, Iraq is a better place now that Saddam Hussein has been removed from power, but Liberal Democrat Members, like Conservative Members, Labour Members, nationalists and others who voted against the war never suggested that we supported his murderous regime. Is that what the hon. Gentleman is implying?

Hugh Robertson indicated dissent.

Mr. Keetch: I am glad that is not.

Clare Short: If one looks carefully at the surveys of opinion in Iraq, one finds that the overwhelming majority of people are glad that Saddam Hussein is gone, but terribly worried about the disorder and chaos that, they say, make their life worse in many ways. A properly planned and organised action through the UN might have made Iraq a very much better place than it is now.

Mr. Keetch: The right hon. Lady is right. I remember the debates that she had with my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), then a Front-Bench colleague of mine, about planning for the aftermath of the war. Many of us would have liked a full-scale independent inquiry into the war, including the question of whether we were preparing correctly for the aftermath. I certainly remember saying in debates in the House that winning a war would be easy but winning the peace would be much more difficult.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Keetch: I seem to recall that when the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex was speaking I inquired six times whether he would give way. He was not courteous enough to do so, but I shall of course be courteous enough to give way to his Front- Bench colleague.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. Soames: And charm.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed.

May I point out to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) that Conservative Members repeatedly asked the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), then Secretary of State for International Development, to come to the House and tell us the plan for post-conflict reconstruction in Iraq? The Government's signal failure to share those plans with the House and the country had chaotic consequences after the war.

Mr. Keetch: In the run-up to the war, history records, it was the Liberal Democrats and very brave Members from other parties who asked those questions. The Conservatives appeared to support the endeavours of President Bush, whatever he wanted to do, and it was the Liberal Democrats, some brave Labour Back Benchers, a number of important Conservatives, and Members from other parties who provided the real opposition.

Clare Short rose—

Mr. Keetch: I shall accept one final intervention.

Clare Short: There was a rather strange procedure, and I shall come to those matters if I catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. For the record, I came to the House repeatedly and there was a Select Committee inquiry, so there were full preparations. A lie is being told now that the chaos in Iraq is all because I thought that we were rushing to war too rapidly. That is such a ridiculous proposition that it shames the mental capacities of anyone who seeks to make it.

Mr. Keetch: The right hon. Lady is more than capable of defending herself. On her actions, all that I would say is that she resigned from the Government after the war had begun. In fairness, many of us believe that her position would be strengthened if she had followed the example of the right hon. Member for Livingston

(Mr. Cook), who resigned before the war. Nevertheless, she did an honourable thing, and history will record that fact.

Turning to the defence budget, I congratulate the Defence Secretary on the assurances that he has received from the Chancellor. I hope that the "real-terms increases" mentioned by the Chancellor are significant and not simply academic, and that any additional funds for operations in Iraq will come out of separate Treasury funds. Caveats attach to the Chancellor's commitments. How much of the cost of British forces' continuing commitments in Iraq will be funded by the MOD budget, and what extra resources will the Treasury make available? Estimates abound, some of them quite wild, about the cost of operations in Iraq, so I would be grateful if the Minister of State could quell the rumours and confirm the monthly cost of keeping forces on deployment in Iraq. If there are increased costs, will they be met from a separate Treasury fund or the existing MOD budget?

The procurement budget is still over-committed, and adjustments need to be made at some stage. It would be preferable if the Secretary of State could make them sooner rather than later. Liberal Democrats believe that there are potential savings in the defence budget in the area of procurement. For example, speculation continues that the third tranche of Eurofighter Typhoon is already dead in the water and that the Government are simply waiting for the right time to cancel. Can the Minister give a commitment to the third tranche of Eurofighter?

Some indiscriminate cost savings are proposed by the Conservatives. The shadow Defence Secretary says that there will be no cuts, but a two-year freeze in real terms is effectively a cut. In his speech, he gave commitments—I listed them—on infantry numbers, training, deployment and procurement. He will not be able to do that with a two-year effective freeze on defence spending. We have questioned the rather ridiculous approach to defence spending that seems to be the sole approach of the Conservative party.

We understand that tough choices need to be made. The third tranche of the Eurofighter programme should be reviewed. That alone could amount to a one-off saving of several billion pounds.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): May I suggest another saving? The MOD should not to seek to recreate the facilities of RAF Bulmer at another base, which would require substantial capital to replace capital that has recently been invested there. I have made the point in detail to the Minister. [Interruption.]

Mr. Keetch: I hear the Minister for the Armed Forces saying that that is being dealt with. I look forward to visiting Bulmer with my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) in a few weeks. I know that it is an important base that the Royal Air Force and other forces want to keep, and I know my right hon. Friend's commitment to that part of his constituency.

Mr. Jack: When the hon. Gentleman comments on the third tranche—the 155 Eurofighters that his party seems to advocate cutting—will he put on the record the work share implications and the costs to the United Kingdom industrial base if that policy were pursued?

Mr. Keetch: We have asked detailed questions of the Government, some of which have not been answered. We want to know what the implications would be. Yes, we want to review the third tranche. That is a specific commitment from the Liberal Democrats. We would put some of the money that would be saved back into the defence budget to increase basic kit for our forces. That is in marked contrast to the swingeing cuts proposed by the Tories, who provide no details of the programmes that they would consider cutting and make blanket commitments to our overall force plan.

The Secretary of State said in his speech to the Royal United Services Institute last year that > "measuring the capability of our Armed Forces by the number of units or platforms in their possession will no longer be significant".

We understand that. We need to consider it in terms of the MOD budget. It is not a question of how much is spent, but how well it is spent. United States defence spending continues to soar far above that of the rest of the world. No matter what the Government's spending review eventually allocates to the MOD, the UK budget will always be a fraction of that of the US.

Clearly, however, much of the MOD's planning revolves around the UK working in conjunction with the US. The White Paper stated:

> "The most demanding expeditionary operations, involving intervention against state adversaries, can only plausibly be conducted if US forces are engaged."

It is difficult to argue with that analysis—indeed, we support it, but it could have an immense impact on our armed forces. We cannot match US defence spending, so we cannot keep pace with the US in defence developments. At the same time, we are seen as the partner of choice in the Pentagon, and the MOD's planning is clearly based on that assumption.

The key to remaining fully interoperable, to remaining the partner of choice and to remaining able to link to US forces is what the Secretary of State calls network-enabled capability, or NEC. There is no doubt that NEC is a very important development in military planning and operations. The pre-eminence that it receives in the new chapter of the SDR and in the White Paper shows that it is at the forefront of MOD thinking. But there is also no doubt that it is expensive and that if we are to keep pace with the US, it will take an ever-increasing slice of the defence budget.

I should like a much clearer indication than the Government have so far given of the limits of that approach and how it will affect our ability to contribute to peacekeeping, stabilisation operations and so on. Our forces are overstretched. We know that from the Defence Medical Services and others. There is a balance to be struck between money going into NEC and money going into the basics of our infantry units. We believe that the correct balance may not have been achieved. As regards our reserve forces, we know from the debate yesterday and from the comments of General Walker and General Jackson that they are concerned about overstretch evolving.

The series of reports from the National Audit Office, the Ministry of Defence and, most recently, the Defence Committee, shows that a number of areas—for example, asset tracking—have improved as a result of operations in Iraq, and the Government must make a commitment on those areas and not blindly follow the US into ever-increasing technological warfare. Whatever the technology, one cannot keep the peace on the streets of Pristina or rebuild Iraq from satellites, so one must have troops on the ground.

The White Paper discusses "medium-weight" troops that are well armoured but rapidly deployable, yet it does not dispute the continued need for some light and some heavy forces. We believe that tanks, fighter aircraft and several parts of the fleet are less important than they used to be, and that point is argued in the White Paper. However, the White Paper does not contain firm proposals for reshaping our armed forces, which is a recipe for instability and anxiety—it is an interesting pointer to the direction in which the armed forces may be heading, but it hardly charts their course. We believe that that deficiency should be addressed sooner rather than later in a spirit of consultation and consensus, and if the Government give us that, we will certainly participate in the process.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy—"That's another fine mess you've got me into"—came to mind when I listened to the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames). I know that the hon. Gentleman looks more like Oliver Hardy than Stan Laurel, but it is his friend Oliver who has got him into the right mess of trying to justify the Conservative Front-Bench view. The Conservative policy of cutting or freezing the armed forces budget while making massive commitments is untenable.

Given what we had to do in Iraq, I wondered what policy the Liberal Democrats would have adopted if Lord Ashdown of Norton-sub-Hamdon had been their leader during last year's conflict. Whatever my views of Paddy Ashdown, I recognise that he adopts consistent views and would not flip-flop from one day to the next to try to fit in with perceived public opinion in either this country or Iraq.

The Defence Committee, of which I am a member, was in Bosnia and Kosovo one month ago. We recently published an important report—it has already been quoted—on the lessons of Iraq, and it made many recommendations, which I do not have time to refer to today. Some of those recommendations are extremely important, particularly those that point out that, given the armed forces' other operational requirements, Operation Telic placed demands on the armed forces that were close to the maximum that they could sustain. Whatever other lessons are learned—this point was confirmed by remarks made by the chiefs of staff in yesterday's Defence Committee hearing—this country's international commitments to NATO and the UN, our EU obligations, Operation Fresco during the firefighters dispute and the foot-and-mouth crisis placed enormous demands on our armed forces. We have an ongoing commitment in Northern Ireland, which unfortunately cannot be reduced significantly because of the current situation. On top of the deteriorating situation in Kosovo over the past week, difficulties may also arise in parts of the world that we are not even thinking about at the moment.

I want to highlight the issue of Kosovo and the Balkans. I was quite impressed by what has been achieved in Bosnia. Paddy Ashdown is doing an excellent job, and, although the agreement was not ideal, a framework was laid down in the 1995 Dayton accords, so there is a basis for progress. Discussions are moving towards establishing a joint defence ministry and forming an association with NATO's partnership for peace. That is all to the good. It means that in its political institutions Bosnia can begin to build on the already established levels of security and normality, whereby people from different religions and ethnic groups can walk around without being stoned or kidnapped, instead of having to be bussed under Army protection.

Sadly, one cannot say that about the situation in Kosovo, which has been frozen since 1999: almost no progress has been made in any of the major areas. Those who supported the 1999 bombing of Serbia without a UN resolution, believing that it would liberate the country and create a multi-ethnic, harmonious society, have to face the fact that that has not happened. Kosovo is a mafia society, where there is 60 to 70 per cent. unemployment and ongoing ethnic cleansing. The continual attacks on UN personnel have only recently been highlighted in the media again because of the appalling atrocities and outrages that were carried out last weekend. In the past few days, a church built in 1352 was burned to the ground, thousands of people were driven out of their homes, and between 28 and 31 people were killed. In the past two days, two UN police were killed. It is a society where criminality is dominant. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) referred to the smuggling of drugs through the Balkans.

If we do not get Kosovo right, we will have a running sore at the heart of Europe. Europe and the European Union must take the greater responsibility, but we must handle the situation very carefully. It is easy for the EU to say, "There can be no partition." On the other hand, we cannot suggest that we should allow an independent Kosovo on the basis of its current structures and its domination by one group—the largest group, comprising more than 90 per cent. of the population. Given the continuing policy of ethnic cleansing, we must take into account the plight of the minorities. There are Albanian minorities in the Presevo valley in Serbia; there is a substantial Albanian minority in Macedonia; and a right-wing, nationalist coalition Government have been elected in Serbia. There are significant political problems of instability. In thinking of a way forward, we must not foreclose any options, but be very sensitive to what might be required.

Mrs. Mahon: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said, but does he think that it would have been better had NATO and UNMIK bitten the bullet and arrested people such as Agim Ceku—a wanted war criminal—and Hashim Thaci, who are now running Kosovo? Good people in Kosovo such as Dr. Rugova and Veton Surroi are being marginalised while these well known criminals and war criminals, who are involved in organised crime, are in charge.

Mike Gapes: I do not wish to comment on particular individuals who should be arrested. However, it is clear that there is an active organised crime network that is linked to political godfathers and overseas funding from expatriate communities, and that there have been ongoing operations. When we visited, we were told, "Being in the Kosovo police service is a tough business for an honest cop." That suggests that there are problems, and we need to be honest about them.

On NATO's future involvement, it is absolutely essential that we do not weaken security in Kosovo. Fortunately, we, the French and the Germans sent extra forces in very quickly, which I hope will stabilise the situation so that we can make progress, but there are worries. Owing to the good progress that has been made in Bosnia, the military presence there has been reduced, and we are planning to move from the NATO stabilisation force, SFOR, to a European Union force, EUFOR, by the end of the year. That force in Bosnia is the reserve force for intervention in Kosovo, should events go badly there. I would like assurances from the Government that the transition to EUFOR—I do not oppose it—will be robust, that the national caveats with some of our EU partners will be removed so that the force can work effectively, not just on the military side but on the paramilitary and policing sides, and that intelligence work can continue. That would be good, but I do not want to end up weakening our capability to reinforce what could be a much more serious situation in Kosovo, because we have run down or changed the mandate in Bosnia.

Another question is how we deal with the politics and dynamics for the future. Last December, the international bodies that oversee Kosovo agreed a document called "Standards for Kosovo", which was published and presented on 10 December. It sets out as an aspiration:

> "A Kosovo where all—regardless of ethnic background, race or religion—are free to live, work and travel without fear, hostility or danger and where there is tolerance, justice and peace for everyone."

In the space of one and a half years from the date of that document, Kosovo is meant to become such a society, and have independent status. It is supposed to have:

> "Functioning Democratic Institutions... Rule of Law... Freedom of Movement... Sustainable Returns and the Rights of Communities and their members".

There should be an economy where:

> "Basic economic legislation is in place and enforced, relevant Government institutions and services are functioning, the budget process is functioning and meeting all legal requirements", and so on. Property rights should be resolved, there should be political dialogue and the Kosovo protection corps should be functioning in full compliance with the rule of law.

The Albanian-Kosovan community believes that it can sign up to that document, and that by the middle of 2005 Kosovo will become an independent state, within its existing borders. Is it realistic to pretend that all those things can happen in a society where there is no industry, where some of the institutions barely function, which has a Serb area in Mitrovica in the north that operates a parallel Administration—separately from the central Administration—and whose Parliament has banners, posters and symbols of one community only, not of all the communities in the state? We have underestimated the problems. We need to be robust about pushing forward the standards agenda, but we must be realistic. We will not secure investment to deal with unemployment in Kosovo until the legal basis is established. What pressures, then, does that put on our military and on our long-term commitment as a whole, through NATO and the EU?

Mr. Dalyell: As a man who raised an urgent question on this subject, may I say that my hon. Friend is making a speech of such importance that I hope that it is read by the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister? Does he agree that something must be done about industry, particularly the repair of the nickel factory, which will be the engine of any economy that Kosovo might hope for?

Mike Gapes: I saw that nickel factory from afar—in fact, I smelled it from afar. Standing at the top of the monument in Kosovo Polje—the Field of Blackbirds—and looking across, it was all that was visible on the horizon. The temperature was minus 16° and the smoke was lingering in the distance. On top of everything else, there is serious pollution; it is a very polluted society. [Interruption.] Other members of the Select Committee who are present are laughing, because they remember that scene as well.

In the time remaining, I want to suggest a possible way forward politically and administratively. I was involved in the talks in Northern Ireland in 1997 and 1998, as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, when he was Minister of State. One factor that made those talks successful was the involvement of the British and the Irish Governments, together with close support from the United States in the form of Senator George Mitchell, and financial and political support from the European Union.

We need to look again at Kosovo, and to create a structure that will bring together the Albanian and Serbian Governments and enable discussion, and that will involve the European Union, NATO, the United States and the United Nations. We need to put everything on the table, and to try to find a way through without taking entrenched positions on status, cantons or partitions. The process needs to be intensive and we need to begin it now. If we do not, we will not succeed in eliminating this running sore, which constitutes a threat to the stability of the entire Balkans region and potentially, therefore, to western Europe.

It is in our interests to take such action because we want a Europe that is harmonious. We do not want ethnic or religious conflict on this continent; we do not want Orthodox Christians pitted against Muslims; we do not want ethnic cleansing or any of the developments that have tragically occurred in the past week. We have got to act quickly and we need engagement. We have spent $8 billion in Kosovo since 1999, but one wonders where it has gone.

Clare Short: I agree with my hon. Friend that this running sore must be dealt with and that we need to bring everyone together, but there is another dimension. One reason why the economy is not moving is the lack of final status. The World Bank cannot engage and no one will invest, which means that the economy is bad. We need to secure final status to get the economy moving, and to make the progress that my hon. Friend is calling for.

Mike Gapes: I made that point earlier. I accept that until final status is achieved it is almost impossible to invest, but we cannot achieve that status without securing assurances about human rights and resolving the other issues. We are talking about a regional problem that requires a regional solution. The Albanian and Serbian Governments must be partners in a process that must also involve Macedonia and the other countries in the region. That process must be backed up by European Union resources and a security guarantee from NATO, and be under the overall umbrella of the United Nations. Even then we might not succeed, as we saw in Northern Ireland, but we have to try.

3.59 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): I begin by drawing the House's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. It is a particular pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), who devoted much of his speech to Kosovo. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) made it clear in her repeated interventions that what is needed is final political status. It would have been a good idea to understand what that final political status was going to be before committing our armed forces in 1999. That lack of knowledge is precisely why we are in our current wretched position, which I, among others, predicted. We have ended up fighting the Albanians—the very people whom we went in to help in the first place.

The wretched truth of our involvement in Kosovo is that we now have to deal with criminal gangs—the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) mentioned them—who are responsible for the criminal behaviour taking place in that country. NATO and the UK—particularly our Prime Minister, who had a personal strategy—were manipulated by the Kosovo Liberation Army, which began a campaign of terror against the Serbian authorities in Kosovo. In turn, they reacted with all the brilliant strategic skill that might be expected of President Milosevic, triggering the intervention in his country. We should have been much clearer about what exactly we were intervening for, and what the political status would be at the end of the intervention. We still have to sort that out.

I welcome the fact that the President of Serbia is now talking seriously about partition. It is difficult to see any other solution in Kosovo than to accept the reality of the ethnic cleansing there. There are now very few Serbian schoolchildren in Kosovo; people with families have effectively disappeared from the country and gone to Serbia. We have to accept the reality of that position, as we accepted the reality in Bosnia with the de facto acceptance of two political authorities there.

I wish to deal briefly with the canard of the defence budget. Having been special adviser to the then Secretary of State for Defence between 1993 and 1995—not the easiest time for the defence budget—it is a little rich to hear the comments of Labour and Liberal Democrat Members today. Where were they in the days when the defence budget was under pressure? The Labour party was committed to a policy of a 30 per cent. cut to bring us down to average of EU member states, and the Liberal party trumped even that with a demand for a 50 per cent. cut.

I listen to the reinvention of history in this afternoon's debate with the same interest as I listen to the Chairman of the Defence Committee, who likes to present the Labour party as riding to the country's rescue in the 1930s in support of Mr. Churchill. I have to point out that, until 1935, the party was led by Mr. Lansbury, who wanted to disarm the UK in its entirety.

My confidence is the same as that expressed by Lord King in yesterday's defence debate in the other place. He said that whenever he had to go to a Conservative Chancellor or Chief Secretary to the Treasury to ask for money, he was satisfied that no Conservative Government would ever be found wanting in providing the defence resources that were required. At the same time, Conservative Governments have a proper responsibility to ensure that the fiscal affairs of the country are kept in good order. We are not a party wedded to public expenditure and taxation: we want to spend the public's money wisely. I believe that that is exactly what we did in our last period of office, which also explains why the present Government enjoyed such a magnificent golden economic inheritance. The Chancellor's success has come from his first Budget of 1997, when he continued the public expenditure plans that he inherited.

We should also remember that the strategic defence review of 1998 was accompanied by a budget cut in real terms of about £0.5 billion a year. By 2005–06, that will have rolled up into a cumulative cut of about £3 billion-worth of defence expenditure. The Government now tell us about budget increases, but by that time the sums allocated will have reached only £2.5 billion, so the truth is that the Government have cut defence expenditure during their period of office.

The Secretary of State for Defence devoted a considerable proportion of his speech to attacking my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) and my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor, but, as yet, the Conservative party has adopted no position on defence expenditure. The Secretary of State alleged that the shadow Chancellor had spoken about expenditure being limited "within all Departments". As far as I am concerned, that is a wholly satisfactory state of affairs; I was not elected to the House to raise taxes or support overall increases in public expenditure. My responsibility is to ensure that my constituents' money is spent more wisely, so that they can choose where their private expenditure goes. The differing approaches to public and private expenditure represent the philosophical difference between the Opposition and the Government, and they are a proper subject for debate.

[Mr. Crispin Blunt]

At present, the defence budget and our armed forces are in considerable trouble. I draw the House's attention to the remarks made yesterday in the other place by Lord Guthrie, with whom I do not always agree, especially about Kosovo. He said:

"My experience and instinct tells me that we are already in very difficult times, perhaps as difficult as any time since World War II. The only time of similar concern that I can recall was the late 1970s when it became necessary for a new government to rescue defence from ever increasing decline. But today I judge the situation to be far more serious than it was then."

That is the background to the rumours emerging from the MOD about the work going on in the lead-up to the annual round of long-term costings for the defence budget. Yesterday, the Chief of the Defence Staff told the Defence Committee that it was all part of the normal annual process. If so, the scale of the challenge is greater than anything experienced in my time at the MOD.

The 1993 public expenditure settlement called for a cut of £750 million in the defence budget, and we embarked on an exercise called "Front Line First". Something like 23 or 24 cost studies were carried out across the MOD, and they found savings worth £1 billion in the way that the MOD did business. No front-line provision was cut, and in fact £250 million in additional annual expenditure was made available. That was used for additional flying training for the RAF, and the Tomahawk cruise missile was also a product of those savings.

"Front Line First" was a serious and far-reaching study, covering the whole of the MOD. However, it had a deleterious effect on some areas, including recruitment and the Defence Medical Services. That is worth remembering: savings on that scale are very unlikely to produce a completely positive effect.

The MOD is now being invited to achieve savings on twice the scale of "Front Line First". The exercise is cloaked by the claim that it is merely the normal, annual process of balancing the budget and ensuring that everything fits the long-term costings that have been made. The challenge that we faced was only half as big, and our approach was to ask those members of the armed forces and MOD civil servants who would be affected for their ideas about delivering defence more efficiently.

Statements were made to the House about the process and its conduct. It began after the public expenditure settlement of October and November 1993, and was completed in the summer of 1994, when a report was made to the House. No such detail is available today, either to the House or to members of the services. All we know is that quite high-level studies are being carried out into areas of capability such as anti-submarine warfare or ground-based air defence. Those studies deal with the choices being made in the defence White Paper.

The White Paper is a terribly thin document, compared with its predecessors. They went into detail about where expenditure was being applied, and provided proper analyses of what the MOD was being invited to do and the defence tasks facing the armed forces. Of course, the nature of those defence tasks moves on with the times, but I counsel the Government to adopt a philosophical approach similar to that of the 1993 White Paper.

That seminal document laid out three sets of defence tasks. The first was the defence of the United Kingdom, the second was NATO and the third defence task was in effect the rest of the world. The analysis meant that defence tasks one and two were delivered with the force structure that was being followed by the Government and defence task three was a free good delivered on the back of the forces being provided for mandatory tasks one and two.

Times have moved on a little and we are faced with a different challenge, namely, the relationship between Europe and the United States. My concern is that we appear to be betting the shop on the US. Again I shall quote Lord King. Yesterday during the debate on defence the Under-Secretary, Lord Bach, said that it was inconceivable that there would be any major conflict in which the United States would not wish to be involved. My noble Friend replied:

"The Minister said that it was inconceivable that we would find ourselves in certain circumstances where the United States would not be with us. I merely warn him that it was my experience when I had any responsibility for defence that the inconceivable usually happened"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 March 2994; Vol. 659, c. 730, 745.]

In trying to decide on the shape of the armed forces for the future, we should try to pursue a relationship with the United States that takes advantage of network-enabled capabilities and of making sure that our armed forces can co-operate with the United States in terms of command and control, and so on. In that way, and in what we expect to be the majority of circumstances where we shall deploy troops on large-scale operations, we can operate effectively alongside the States. If, in the process of doing that, we ignore the development of our European allies' defence capabilities and do not ensure that we can operate alongside the Germans, the French, the Italians and the other main European members of NATO, we do so at our peril.

The Government are trying to cover both bases, but they must ensure that the UK Government have a choice about their future defence policy. It is the traditional geo-strategic position of the United Kingdom to have to try and cover both bases. If we end up becoming Robin to the United States Batman, we shall have neglected the ability to have properly organised, trained and equipped forces that can also operate with our European partners. Then we may be presented with what currently appears inconceivable: that the United States might lose the political will to intervene around the world. I suspect that we are seeing the high watermark of US willingness to intervene around the world, to bear the burden and to "pay any price", to quote a President of 40 years ago. The United States may reach the stage where they are not prepared to pay that price. The United Kingdom, with our spread of interests around the world, is a global, international country, and it is absolutely in our interests to continue to make a contribution to global security as the greatest per capita trading nation in the world. We need to ensure that we can do that either with the US or with our immediate neighbours in Europe. The challenge facing the Ministry of Defence is to produce policies and equipment that enable us to do that.

4.13 pm

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): I shall return to the broad swathe of the White Paper, although I was tempted to narrow it down and deal with particular areas. I should like to comment on how thin it is in terms of its physical structure. Clearly, it is a conceptual document and it is not meant to have the detail in it. It is trying to get people to buy into a general conceptual approach—the detail will come later. It stems from the important decision, made some time ago, to introduce expeditionary forces in peacetime—however one defines peace since the second world war. The White Paper reviews the type and periodicity of operations and raises questions about the range at which British forces will operate. In that sense it differs from the last strategic defence review and earlier documents. The report deals also with homeland security and the military interface with the civil authorities.

Defence equipment is the sexy part of the document on which the press and others immediately pick up. As to air defence, there are questions about whether there will be single-role fast jets and if so, how many; training for multi-role tasking; and whether there will be 200 Typhoons or only 130 as rumoured. The Defence Select Committee will try to find answers from the appropriate individuals. Will there, for example, be a carrier version of certain aircraft? We hope to put flesh on the bones of the conceptual document. There have been welcome announcements about air tankers and refuelling but there are also issues about heavy lift capabilities.

Legitimate questions are being asked also about carriers—such as the length of their decks, and whether there will be a short take-off and vertical landing version of the joint fighter. What will be the role of destroyers? The Defence Select Committee recently reported on Operation Telic, the use of helicopters, and where the land starts and the sea stops. There are questions to be asked also about defence both on the sea and from the sea. I ask my right hon. Friend to consider seriously the place of the merchant marine and whether British ships and British-registered ships should be involved.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) asked earlier whether the Bowman communications system works in the hills. I hope that it does. As that equipment is made in south Wales, there are plenty of opportunities to test whether it works in the hills. That massively important equipment is clearly having a disturbing effect in terms of integration, and I am sure that questions about Bowman training are being addressed, perhaps in some of the work strands to which Conservative Members have referred. We will wait to see.

It is now generally acknowledged that the importance of our reserve forces has recently grown and that they will be fundamental to the operation of the armed services in future. Yesterday, the chiefs of staff seemed to indicate that they were not so concerned about the size of the regular forces. But even if told that they could increase numbers, how would recruitment and retention be achieved? It is therefore clear that reservists will play an increasingly important part and that they will serve alongside and be integrated with the regular forces. We welcome the fact that people are signing up for civil contingency reserves but it will be interesting to see how that activity will be balanced against the work of expeditionary forces.

Compulsory mobilisation will bear examination in future. That has become an issue particularly recently, and the relationship between the reservists, their families and employers, and the support mechanisms to sustain them when they are mobilised will be an important part of the detailed planning for the future. We must also address how reservists are to be used, in formed units or as specialists. Perhaps they might be used as a reconstruction force. It will be interesting to see whether the studies indicate a need for dedicated reconstruction forces, as some other countries have suggested. I have been warned about that, however, and it has been pointed out that reservists do not necessarily join up to do their day job in the reserves. A balance has to be struck.

As for the regular services, there has long been a debate about how to support them and their families, and about their living conditions. Serious decisions will have to be made about where people are based, whether they belong to the RAF or, particularly, the Army. Some of our allies in Europe and the Americans will have to make decisions about how to use more agile forces that are capable of moving more quickly.

One of the chiefs of staff pointed out to me yesterday that both the reservists and the regulars are war fighters and that is what we must train them to be. They can step back from that role, however, to take on the additional tasks that people now expect from British service personnel. Our forces are utility players. They are so capable of performing a range of tasks that they fit easily into the three-block war—in which fighting is taking place at one end of the town, security operations in the middle and reconstruction at the other end. Our forces can change quickly from one activity to another, and that utility comes from their training and experience.

The detailed work on the White Paper should also examine the relationship between the MOD and other Departments engaged in relevant activity. That includes the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and how defence and diplomacy knit together. As one senior officer said to me the other day, "If you want to play brinkmanship, you can do it in several ways. You can give all sorts of indicators to be people, even when buying equipment." Perhaps the Treasury should also be involved, and planners in other Departments could suggest to its bean counters how to deal with decisions. The Department for International Development could also be included, as well as the non-governmental organisations. The Home Office is also involved in relation to homeland security. Arrangements to co-ordinate all those strands are needed, to make it work.

I, too, was in the Balkans with the Defence Committee recently. The area is an example of what is needed for nation building. The heady mixture of crime, nationalism and terror is a strategic threat that raises questions about the sustainability of operations over time. It is not the case that all excursions in the future will be like Iraq. Our forces will have to undertake a range of activities, and some will last longer than originally expected. We have only a small number of personnel in the Balkans, but they punch significantly above their weight. They do so because intelligence is crucial, whether it is military intelligence, defence intelligence, one of the various aspects of Secret Intelligence Service intelligence or police intelligence. All such intelligence has to be joined up. We have seen turf wars in the past, but they will have to stop. Perhaps we should have some special arrangements in the future for linking military intelligence with the other intelligence services to deal better with strategic threats. Human intelligence is crucial. It can involve only very simple things; for example, some of the Gurkhas in the Balkans told us that they wanted night vision equipment. We talk about the need for aircraft carriers and other things that cost millions or billions of pounds, but we can do very simple things that would effect a massive change.

On money, there have been declarations that the defence budget will continue to increase in real terms, although we shall not know the figures until the comprehensive spending review. Obviously, the announcement of a real-terms increase is better than one that says the reverse, but I shall be interested in the amount. I have some questions about the way the Treasury deals with these matters under resource accounting and budgeting, as there are various rumours about the effectiveness of that tool. Keeping the shelves stocked means a lot for Sainsbury's, but the exercise is quite different for the Ministry of Defence. Although resource accounting and budgeting can be useful—it shines a light on many areas, and many members of the armed services will admit that that was necessary—it must be deployed intelligently in the future.

Mr. Blunt: Like me, the hon. Gentleman was present when the Committee made its report on Iraq and he will have heard the presentation by Francis Tusa, supporting his thesis that small incremental enhancements to our current capabilities can make a huge difference for our soldiers on the ground. Francis Tusa referred to improvements to CVR(T)—combat vehicle reconnaissance (tracked)—while the hon. Gentleman referred to night vision goggles, but I hope that he will join me in commending to the Minister the work of Francis Tusa in identifying small increases in spending that could produce a huge capability change for our troops.

Mr. Havard: I was about to say that the White Paper suggests that the whole process should be much more joined up and that many actors can contribute to the debate. I am concerned about the political pressures on us when we make statements about expeditionary forces—as we saw recently when we had to make decisions about going to Iraq. A declaration about an expeditionary force is fine, but that does not mean that I agree with George Bush's doctrine of pre-emptive action. We need to be clear about what we are doing in this place.

We all need intelligence to make those decisions—that is crucial. However, as a member of the Defence Committee, I am sometimes disappointed about the degree of openness shown by the Ministry of Defence, even towards parliamentary institutions that are actually trying to help to ensure that Parliament has proper information to make those crucial decisions. I appeal to the Minister of State on that point, because the Select Committee will certainly want continual monitoring and debate on such issues. One debate in the Chamber will not do the trick—nor will two or three such debates. We need enduring mechanisms to undertake such monitoring. Obviously, the Select Committee has offered to do so. The process involves not only the Ministry of Defence but other Departments; for example, in relation to intelligence for the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs.

We need to ensure that there are ways of doing and ways of seeing. "Eternal vigilance is the price of freedom", as it says on the old trade union banner. Now and again, that is equally true in relation to the Ministry of Defence. Our decisions on the broader political questions are crucial, and we have to make them. What we cannot and must not do is abdicate that responsibility to those who do not want it, are not prepared for it and are the wrong people to undertake it—the military and the armed forces. Those decisions have to remain in this place and we must have mechanisms to ensure that they do so.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the thoughtful and interesting remarks of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) who, as a member of the Select Committee, speaks with great knowledge. However, I think that in stepping past the point of detail he let his Front-Bench colleagues off the hook. I would have expected the White Paper to deal in much more detail with our defence situation. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) asked whether it was worth producing the White Paper. My answer, which I hope to explain in a few moments, would be, "Probably not".

Mr. Havard: I was not trying to duck the issue. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to have a word with Conservative Front Benchers. If they did not take up so much time, perhaps we Back Benchers would have a bit more time, and the same might apply equally to members of the Government.

Mr. Jack: As a Back Bencher, I have some sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says, but the debate is about the Government's stewardship of our current defence capabilities. What surprises me is that the White Paper is like a menu without prices. There was no mention of resources; there were no costed programmes; there was no detailed information whatsoever about the defence budget. The Chancellor has cited what he terms a real-terms increase, but we do not know how far above the rate of inflation the forward funding of the defence budget will be. There is a clear indication that all sectors of the existing defence budget are under considerable pressure.

Why does paragraph 4.14 of the defence White Paper, under the heading "Air", state that there is an opportunity for "reducing the need for single-role fast jets."?

It continues:

> "Multi-role capability will also allow deployed force packages to be smaller where coverage of multiple roles has previously required additional aircraft."

There is then a sentence that I should have liked to be developed in more detail:

"We are now considering how and when we should reduce the numbers of combat aircraft in order to reflect these developments."

No one can make judgments about our future capabilities—whether in respect of purchasing future projects or in respect of sustaining the operation of current equipment—without that detail. The Government have left us dangling on a hook, wondering exactly what the detail will be.

As the Member of Parliament for Fylde, where BAE Air Systems has a significant plant with some 6,000 employees at Warton, I know that such paragraphs in the White Paper do nothing but leave uncertainty in the minds of the employees, the company and, certainly, the RAF about exactly what their capability will be. It is evident both from the Secretary of State's remarks and from the White Paper that air superiority is a precursor to successful operations in all the conflicts in which we have been involved in recent years.

Aircraft such as the Tornado and the Jaguar illustrate that we are capable of building systems to achieve that success, but those aircraft are now either reaching the mid-point or are towards the end of their service life—certainly, in the case of the Jaguar—and they need to be replaced. Eurofighter has been mentioned, but one must recognise that that aircraft was ordered in the first instance to replace many of the ageing types of aircraft to which I refer. The Conservatives can claim a proud part in ensuring that the Eurofighter project was not only started but sustained, particularly given the pressure from our German partners, who once wanted to pull the plug on it.

I congratulate the Government on continuing with the programme, but I have been tabling parliamentary questions for months asking Ministers when they will make a decision on tranche 2. The ministerial rubber band has now been stretched almost to breaking point. It must now be five or six months since negotiations between the company and the MOD began. There are some important issues in relation to cost. The company's position on the price it is asking for the aircraft and the development of a ground attack capability are central issues, but does it really require such a long time to elapse to get those negotiations sorted out, allowing BAE Systems and its employees at least a degree of certainty?

In answer to my last parliamentary question on the issue, the MOD assured me that moneys had been put in place to try to ensure a smooth flow between the existing activity on tranche 1 and the fact that tranche 2 is now late, but I have now completely lost sight of whether those programmes can sustain the work force or whether some of the rumours that are now sweeping Warton and Salmesbury will come to fruition and the company will start shedding labour. Some difficult decisions will have to be made.

Taking at face value the Secretary of State's speech of October 2002, he made it clear that the United Kingdom had to maintain a strategic aerospace capability, to sustain our technological ability and our design and build capability. We need all those things if we are to maintain independence of action with our own equipment. Unless the decisions are made about tranche 2, we will not know whether that skilled work force can be sustained.

Mention has been made of tranche 3, about which I would not expect the Minister to give a clear view from the Dispatch Box at this juncture: there are negotiations about the aircraft, and the capabilities of the plane may move on, just as tranche 2 is different from tranche 1. However, we need certainty about tranche 2.

It was perceptive of the MOD to spend £3 million with BAE working up a configuration to determine what the naval version of such an aircraft would look like. If nothing else, it positions itself as an extremely useful negotiating chip in the discussions that the MOD will inevitably have on the final cost of the joint strike fighter. We are heavily involved in the project and the new factory at Salmesbury has begun work to make the 10 per cent. share that we have won in the joint strike fighter. The Americans understand competition if nothing else and, if we want to keep their minds concentrated on giving us good value for money for the aircraft, doing something about the marine version of the Eurofighter would be an extremely good way of going about that task.

If the hon. Members for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) and others had been in their places, I am sure they, too, would have wanted to echo the questions that are being asked in BAE Systems about the future of the project. However, I return to the White Paper, which is completely silent on those questions. The Government show a lack of responsibility in raising questions to which they do not supply answers.

We are at the top table on the joint strike fighter because we have the capability in terms of skilled manufacturing ability and our knowledge of short take-off and vertical landing. However, in a parliamentary question to the Prime Minister, I asked what was being done about the findings of the Rand Europe report—which the MOD commissioned some time ago—about the possibility of the United Kingdom being responsible for the repair and maintenance of the joint strike fighter or even its final assembly and check-out. All that requires the United States to release to us, beyond its current agreements, the technologies that underpin the aircraft. I was reassured not only by what the Prime Minister said, but by the nodding of the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary, that all these matters were actively under discussion with our partners in the United States. So far, we have had no word back at all from the Americans that they will release to their closest ally the detailed technologies that underpin t aircraft. So if somebody drops a hammer on and dents the plane that we ultimately buy, we will not have a clue how to repair it, because no one will have told us how it was put together. That raises an important point.

If the United Kingdom, as Ministers have suggested, is to work more in parallel with and alongside the United States in terms of our war-fighting capability, the United States must stop being so selfish is in guarding these technologies. If our systems are to develop alongside each other, there must be compatibility and a genuine understanding that allies must work together on projects such as the joint strike fighter. If we were to go into repair and maintenance and, ultimately, the updating and upgrading of the weapon system when it comes into service, that would provide continuity of employment for tens of thousands of very skilled aerospace workers.

The White Paper is also silent about the Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft. This was a £1.8 billion project. Lots went wrong and BAE has worked hard to get it back under way. We hope that a prototype aircraft will soon fly and that the MOD will order another two maritime versions of it, but what about the other 18 fuselages that remain? There was no word from the MOD as to whether the capability of the aircraft was going to be developed, perhaps even as a bomb-carrying aircraft.

We have heard about the new technologies. I remind the Minister of an article in the August 2003 edition of Aerospace International about unmanned aerial vehicles, which appeared under the heading, "The UK—lagging behind?". The Secretary of State talked about Watchkeeper but said nothing about the UK's unmanned combat aerial vehicle or unmanned aerial vehicle demonstrators. The article simply asks, "Where are they?" We seem to have no work going on to develop our technology. New developments will be utterly central to supporting our troops on the ground, enhancing our war-fighting capability and possibly in future delivering weapons systems by UAVs. Where is the UK's position? I say all that against the background of the aviation innovation and growth team report.

The Minister who is to reply to the debate will have read the Secretary of State's speech in October 2002, when he said:

"But there is a wide range of defence industrial capabilities which we would like to retain in the UK industrial base for economic reasons."

I hope that he meant defence reasons as well. He continued:

"These bring valuable employment opportunities to particular regions of the country; they add high economic value; and they can contribute to defence exports to civil applications".

He went on to say why we must sustain our military aerospace capability. Perhaps in his reply the Minister will tell us what comes next after Eurofighter and the joint strike fighter, because there is no vision in the White Paper about what our air-fighting capability will be over the next 20 or 25 years.

In 1986, the experimental aircraft programme, the precursor to Eurofighter, flew, yet only now, in 2004, are Eurofighters being accepted into RAF service. Unless we have some indication about how that capability is to be sustained, companies such as BAE Systems will struggle to know what their future role will be. Should they amalgamate with United States companies? Should they form closer alliances with Europe? If we are to have an independent capability to maintain our air war-fighting capability, one thing is clear: we need an industry that has the technologies to form alliances, whether with European or with American companies, and to take part in joint projects. Without a clear steer from the Government and without guidance, the company and its work force will struggle to see their future.

Some important issues have been raised. If I have one wish, it is that, at the end of the debate, the Minister will remove some of the uncertainties surrounding Britain's military aerospace capability.

Let me conclude on a positive note by putting on record my appreciation of the work that the Government have done in helping finally to bring to a successful conclusion the longest running saga in terms of overseas export orders: that involving the Hawk, the finest military training plane in the world. At last, the Indians have signed the piece of paper and the "march you up to the top of the hill and march you down again" scenario is over once and for all. I am delighted about that. The work started under a Conservative Government and was finished by this Government. I hope that the Government will show the same determination as they showed in securing the Hawk order to remove the uncertainties that surround many of our vital aerospace projects.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): All of us who listen to him can easily understand the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), and I have considerable sympathy for his concerns about keeping together the skilled teams at Warton and elsewhere. Nevertheless, I have an unpleasant and unpalatable question. Some of the contracts to which he referred—not all, but some—are surely for systems that are as relevant to Britain's 21st century needs as a fleet of dreadnoughts.

Let us take for our example the Eurofighter. As I understand it, 232 are on order, at about £80 million apiece. We have to ask whether we should give such financial priority to a cold war interceptor. What would be the consequences of reducing the number in terms of our relations with the German, Italian and Spanish partners? Some of us wonder whether such systems are suitable for any plausible 21st-century task, but before any decision can be made, we have to know the situation regarding contracts. What contracts have been signed, and what would be the cost of undoing a contract at a later stage? Ministers face an extremely difficult problem. The same sort of argument can be made in respect of Type 42 destroyers, at £1 billion apiece. Some of us have to ask at this stage what would be the military objective of such a sophisticated weapons system in a foreseeable task that our country may be called on to perform?

Sometimes—not very often—a colleague makes a speech in this Chamber that states a problem more eloquently than one could have done oneself. As one who raised the issue of Kosovo and was granted a private notice question on the subject on Monday, I can only say that the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) should be read by all who have to make decisions on that desperately difficult problem in the Balkans. I am glad that he referred to the nickel factory.

I shall simply relate a personal experience, and I hope to be forgiven for crudity. I went to stay for four days in Kosovo with my national service regiment, the Royal Scots Dragoon Guards, which was on duty there. In the presence of the then colonel, David Allfrey, and the then second in command, now colonel of the regiment, Ben Edwards, I was able to talk at length with some of the local Albanian leaders. I would not have had that conversation had not the guns of the British Army been behind me, because they were pretty rough customers. They were truculent, saying, to put it crudely, "Of course we're going to win—we have the power of the penis." By that, they meant that they were going to use population to achieve their objective—greater Albania. Some of us who opposed involvement in Kosovo from the beginning thought that we were being taken for a ride—twisted around the little finger of people whose agenda was very different from what Britain and the United States thought they wanted. The way in which we were manipulated by the Albanians must teach us a lesson.

Last week, with the Inter-Parliamentary Union, some hon. Members had long and serious discussions with the incoming Serbian delegation. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South was present and my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) chaired the meeting, and they will bear out my account. The Serbs said, among other things, that it was all very well to talk about rebuilding Belgrade, but the old buildings were constructed under the Austro-Hungarian empire, so the centre of their capital city could not be rebuilt unless every stone was taken down and construction started again. Bitterness is mounting, and my impression, which my colleagues might share, was of a highly dangerous and explosive situation. People say that it will take between $30 billion and $100 billion to improve the position.

Turning to Afghanistan, after two and a half years, it has been restored to the warlords without our achieving the stated objective of the Afghan bombing, namely the apprehension of al-Qaeda members responsible for 9/11. What exactly are our objectives, and what is the time scale? Having listened to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch), I believe that we are entitled to say that it is easier to put troops in than pull them out. I hope that in the winding-up speeches we will be told what the short and medium-term objective in Afghanistan is. Drug production has gone up 14 times since the Taliban were in power, but I do not think that was the objective of the military intervention.

As for Basra, Brigadier Nick Clark said that there is a clear attack, not on the local community but on the coalition forces. We are seen more and more as an occupying army, and our presence is regarded as an extension of the crusades, which is highly dangerous. The Whips rightly asked me to be brief, so I shall ask one final question, which is not meant to imply, "I told you so." At 5.6 am on 18 December 1979, with Jack Weatherill in the Chair, as part of the old Consolidated Fund debate, I raised at inordinate length—I spoke for three quarters of an hour—the case of a young research student in the university of Brussels who had gone to Urenco at Almelo and pinched nuclear information about centrifuges and, more to the point, addresses of locations where various parts for nuclear weapons could be found. I then tabled two questions to the Prime Minister, and in the Corridor told Mrs. Thatcher, with whom I was then on very good terms, "I hope you don't think that I'm wasting your time with my concerns about this research student." She replied, "Whatever anybody else thinks, I do not think"—the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) will know very well how she could emphasise "I" and say it in a way that no one else could—"that you're wasting time at all." I deduced that the intelligence services were going to take a proper interest in the activities of that research student, whose name was Abel Qader Khan.

The debate started off with my saying that the Rosenbergs, Alan Nunn May, Klaus Fuchs and Bruno Pontecorvo combined may not have done as much damage as that research student. That is all history, but, as I have had rather succinct answers to my parliamentary questions, I want to know, once people were told that there was a problem, what effort was made in the past 10 years to follow it up and keep tabs on it. That man, who sold information to the Iranians, North Koreans and whomsoever has created mayhem, which even the atom spies did not achieve 20 years before. My question is, was that followed up, and have any lessons been learned?

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): I, too, will try to cut my speech down and keep it brief.

We had to deploy an extra 750 troops to Kosovo last week. The entire violent episode exposed the character of the Albanian separatists, some with terrorist and criminal links, who are now in leading positions of power in that province. The Kosovo Liberation Army never disbanded. It simply became the Kosovo Protection Corps. Agim Ceku—I name him again—the man who ethnically cleansed the Krajina, is in charge of the Kosovo Protection Corps.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) that what we saw last week was a flagrant example of ethnic cleansing: 3,500 Serbs were burned out of their homes by well organised gangs and joined the 200,000 who have been expelled from the province during the past five years. Those people are scattered all around Serbia and Montenegro in camps. The hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and I, as officers of the joint group on Yugoslavia, visited some of those camps. I wish other hon. Members would take the trouble to do so. I am pleased that the spotlight is again on those forgotten ethnically cleansed people. Maybe now note will be taken of them.

The violent attacks against the Serbs and other minorities have gone on under the UN, KFOR and so-called protection force administration since the military campaign ended. It is inconceivable to me and many others in the House that thousands of troops from 30 countries are unable to protect the Serbs and other minorities living in the province. Between June 1999 and last week there were 6,923 attacks on the minorities by the Albanian separatists. I make a distinction between them, and people like Dr. Rugova and the men and women of peace in the Albanian community, but the separatists are in charge and they want an ethnically pure state and a greater Albania. Why else would they destroy 154 churches and monasteries? Why else would they want to wipe out a whole culture and eliminate diversity? Their aim is a greater Albania. I am old enough to remember another regime in Europe that sought to eliminate other races and cultures. The consequences for Europe and the world were disastrous.

The latest outbreak of ethnic cleansing was well organised. The Secretary General of NATO, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, accused the Kosovo Albanians and said:

> "What happened last week, orchestrated and organised by the extremist factions in the Albanian community, is unacceptable—it should be condemned and it's a shame."

[Mrs. Alice Mahon]

The UN spokesman said that more than 50,000 people took part in the violence. Only 163 have been arrested. The mob also turned against KFOR and the UN. We know, too, of the tragic killing of two UN policemen.

KFOR must take immediate steps to provide effective protection for the minority communities living under siege. The war criminals such as Agim Ceku and Hashim Thaci who give the Albanian community such a bad name should be arrested and taken to The Hague. UNMIK, which on several occasions has tried to overturn warrants and criminal proceedings against Ceku, should stop doing that.

Let me say something about the links between the separatists and other extremist Islamic groups. On 15 October 2003, a GIS/Defence and Foreign Affairs report—there have been regular reports since the 1970s—indicated that Ceku was directly engaged in support of Albanian-trained Islamic terrorists, and noted:

"During the first half of August 2003 300 Albanian-trained guerrillas including approximately 10 mujahedin (non-Balkan Muslims) were infiltrated across the Albanian border into Kosovo, where many have subsequently been seen in the company (and homes) of members of the so-called Kosovo Protection Corps. The guerrillas were trained in three camps inside the Albanian border at the towns Bajram Curi, Tropoja and Kuks where camps have been in operation since 1997".

From visits to Interpol as a representative on the NATO Parliamentary Assembly, I know that some extremists in Albania and the Kosovo Liberation Army have links with al-Qaeda. Kosovo is in the hands of mafia extremists, organised crime is the main economic activity, and the sinister link to terrorism is definite. I agree with my hon. Friends, and, in particular, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), that we must have a serious discussion about the final settlement in Kosovo, because the issue will not go away.

I shall turn briefly to the most pressing and dangerous situation facing our armed forces today—Iraq. I wish the Secretary of State had updated us on the horrific pictures that we saw yesterday, in which our soldiers were fighting people who were throwing petrol bombs at them. I hope that the Minister will address that point when he sums up. I deeply regret that, just more than one year ago, we were unable to stop what I consider to be an illegal, immoral and extremely dangerous invasion of Iraq.

We know that 600 coalition troops, including 60 British troops, have been killed, and thousands have been injured. It is deeply shaming to the Bush Administration that they take their dead and injured back to America in secret, and I congratulate our Government on honouring our dead, on making sure that the injured get the best possible treatment and on not trying to keep the public away.

I want to say something about the civilians who have been killed in Iraq since the beginning of the war, because most of the people who have been killed are civilians and their deaths are rarely reported. Dr. John Sloboda, an academic with the Oxford Research Group, has set up a body called, "Iraq Body Count", which is an independent count of media-reported civilian deaths as a result of coalition military action and the occupation. His sources are published and are easily available on the internet for anyone to check or dispute, but, to the best of my knowledge, no one has done so up to now.

Dr. Sloboda and his team should be congratulated, and I shall quote from "Iraq Body Count", because, as part of the occupying force, my Government have a responsibility towards Iraqi civilians, and, at the very least, we should report and record the dead and injured:

"An Iraqi family . . . lost 11 members when U.S. soldiers opened fire as their sport utility vehicle approached a checkpoint."

The mother in that family kept saying this over and over again to the media:

"'I saw the heads of my two little girls come off,' Hassan's wife, Lamea, 36, recalled numbly. She repeated herself in a flat, even voice: 'My girls—I watched their heads come off their bodies. My son is dead.'"

Similarly, we were responsible for civilian deaths when we hit the wrong targets. At about 6 am, one family sheltering in a bunker, which had been constructed when the last American bombs fell, lost 10 members as the house collapsed around them. How can one compensate for that kind of tragedy?

Killings are still taking place under the occupation, and even in UK-controlled areas such as Basra, public security is inadequate. We now know that up to 10,600 civilians have died since we invaded in March 2003, and the civilian death toll is the worst from a war waged by either the United States or the United Kingdom since the Vietnam war. We should all reflect on that point: we should certainly not try to hide from it, and we should record the figures. The US-UK coalition has repeatedly said that it will not record the figures, and now the US-appointed Baghdad authorities have refused to recognise the need and the duty to account for those civilian deaths. As Dr. John Slobodo says, Iraqi civilians are now relegated to the status of "non-people."

Decisions have to be made about Iraq. With the death toll of American soldiers mounting and a presidential election in the offing, the United States is desperate to transfer powers by the end of June and wants to step back from the bubbling cauldron that it helped to create. That strategy of bringing democracy to Iraq stands little chance of success unless certain things happen. The temporary governing council, its ministers and their advisers all owe their allegiance to Mr. Bremer and the United States, and the Iraqi people know that. Many people in the interim Government are still based outside the country and show no signs of returning with their families to settle in Iraq, so they do not command much public confidence.

The intercession of the United Nations is welcome, but we want it to be done in a proper manner, and only if Kofi Annan is able, and is seen to be able, to act as a genuinely independent element in resolving the impasse. If Iraqis perceive him as providing a fig leaf for United States intentions, he, too, will be rejected. The situation in Iraq is desperate, and requires much more discussion.

5.6 pm

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): I rise to set the record straight on the very important question of why there is such a disastrous lack of security in Iraq and why better arrangements were not put in place to help the people of Iraq to reconstruct their country. That issue is obviously terribly important for the people of Iraq. As I said earlier, the current disorder is leading them to say that no matter how much they welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein is gone, the situation in which they are living is worse than that which preceded it. The question of how we are to bring them security is enormously urgent and difficult. It is important to learn how we got into this mess in order to find our way forward.

More broadly, in the post-cold war world, the military phase of any conflict that arises from failed states and civil wars is quite short and relatively easy. The reconstruction of countries is the difficult and complex part, but it is crucial to ensuring future stability and security. We need to learn those skills more effectively and hone the international system for dealing with such situations.

I have already drawn the House's attention on a point of order to the false claim made in the report by the Select Committee on Defence entitled, "Lessons of Iraq", which was published on 3 March 2004. It states at paragraph 358:

"It has also been suggested that" the Department for International Development's

"role in post-conflict planning was constrained by the attitude of the then Secretary of State towards the prospect of military action. Although our witness from DfID denied that this was the case, we remain to be convinced."

That assertion is completely untrue and is based on absolutely no evidence. I am enormously surprised that any Committee of this House should conduct itself in such a shoddy manner by making an assertion based on no evidence, not having taken evidence from the Member concerned.

Following the publication of the report, I wrote to the Chairman of the Select Committee telling him that the claim was untrue and offering to give evidence to the Committee on the preparations that were made. He replied that the Committee stood by the false claim, and I was invited, along with anyone else who might be interested, to provide written evidence to rebut it. What a topsy-turvy world we appear to be living in. I hope that no one makes that suggestion to the Home Secretary in relation to our courts—he might even take it up.

Mike Gapes: My right hon. Friend is attacking the Defence Committee. She should be aware that during our investigations over the past year many of us on the Committee had extensive discussions with many people about what was happening in Iraq. On that basis, we were not satisfied with the response that we received from officials in her former Department. The Chairman of the Committee is not here at the moment, so he cannot reply on his own behalf. I should like to place on the record that the Committee has written to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), and that if she has something to communicate to us, she can no doubt do so, and we can continue with it later.

Clare Short: I am sorry, but obviously my hon. Friend was so busy getting up to rebut what I said that he did not listen to it. I just referred to the letter that I received—a letter that invites me not to give evidence but to rebut a false assertion, which was based on no evidence whatever. This is a serious matter. It is an insult to me and an insult to my former Department. It also suggests that the Defence Committee is not interested in learning lessons and finding out the truth about why there is such chaos in Iraq. That is a serious matter for the government system.

Rachel Squire rose—

Clare Short: I will not give way, because I would like to get on and make my speech.

From the very beginning, my view on Iraq was that it was right to threaten to use force to back up the UN's authority, because containment was crumbling and sanctions were hurting, but that there was no need to rush. That is where all the failure has come from. The Defence Committee failed to face up to the reasons for the lack of supplies for our troops and the lack of preparation for the possible use of chemical weapons. Defence intelligence had assessed that there was such a risk. Those reasons were that the date for war was fixed early on, that there was deceit about that date having been fixed, and that the preparations for military action came very late and were not fully made.

Rachel Squire rose—

Clare Short: No, I will not give way because I want to get on, if I may.

Matters were different, however, over preparations for the reconstruction of Iraq. We prepared for reconstruction with international support. When I agreed to stay in the Government, having been pressed very hard to do so by the Prime Minister—I had intended to resign at the time of the war and to vote against the Government—I did so on an absolute promise that there would be a UN mandate for reconstruction, and that reconstruction would be internationalised. I decided to take the flak and the criticism for failing to resign because, knowing that the war was unstoppable, I wanted to try to ensure that reconstruction was carried out properly. That was the most crucial matter to the interests of Iraq and the people of the middle east.

Various preparations were made. First, the military, as an occupying power, has a duty under the Geneva convention and The Hague regulations to keep order and to provide for any immediate humanitarian needs. We worked with our Ministry of Defence to purchase food and make preparations for the possible humanitarian crisis, giving our support and advice. Secondly, we provided funding and support for some British non-governmental organisations that have experience of working in Iraq. We gave much support to the Red Cross, which worked in Iraq through the war but, tragically, withdrew afterwards because of the disorder.

We also supported the UN in preparing its intervention. The UN knew an awful lot about Iraq; it had been running the oil-for-food programme for a long time and had considerable numbers of Iraqi staff as well as international staff. Those staff were withdrawn during the conflict, but the UN had supplies in the region and was ready to go back in. The UN, through the office of Kofi Annan and his deputy Louise

[Clare Short]

Frechette, was fully prepared to move in, under the sort of mandate that it had been given in Afghanistan, to help the Iraqis to put in place an interim Government to start the reconstruction. If that had happened, the whole international community would have engaged with the process. I had discussions with my fellow Ministers across the international system, including in France, Germany, the Scandinavian countries and Canada, and had said to everyone that, whatever our differences over the route to war in Iraq, we must all come together to help Iraq to reconstruct. All that was in place, and ready to go.

So what happened then? There was a big argument, which the Select Committee report alludes to, between the State Department and the Pentagon in the United States of America. The State Department had made full preparations for the situation after the conflict, but it was pushed to one side. The Pentagon took over, made it absolutely clear that it did not want any significant role for the UN, and set up ORHA—the Office for Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance in Iraq—which was assembled only weeks before the conflict began. Major-General Tim Cross, whom I had worked with in Kosovo in the support of refugees, became its deputy and found that the furniture was still being moved about and that there were no plans.

That is what happened. The international system and all the international preparations were brushed to one side, and ORHA moved in with retired general Jay Garner in charge. That body was in Kuwait for a time, and it had been busy with Secretary Rumsfeld selecting which Iraqis would have significant positions. No proper preparations were made for keeping order or for giving the UN a proper role—which would, in turn, have brought in the international community. Members will remember the arguments. Will the Indians come in? Will the Pakistanis come in? It was a very good idea to have a substantial Muslim country supporting the keeping of peace and order in Iraq, but none of them would do so without a proper UN mandate and resolution.

That is the shameful story. There were two great blunders, the first of which was to rush to war too fast, without first exhausting all possible means of disarming Iraq or proving that it had no weapons of mass destruction. Indeed, we should have tried to indict Saddam Hussein, while authorising armed support for the UN weapons inspectors if need be. We had to be willing always to contemplate force to back up the authority of the UN if necessary, but in my view we should have taken more time. The reason why we went to war when we did is that there was an unwillingness to rotate the troops through the hot weather. That is why we got into the mess that we did, and why our troops were subjected to such risks.

The second failure was the arrogance of forcing other members of the Security Council to say yes to a war by a pre-ordained date. In doing so, the UN was completely brushed aside, and the international system's machinery for helping a country to reconstruct was not used. In addition, because the Office for Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance was so focused on its political tasks, the military moved away from their duty under the Geneva convention and The Hague regulations, which is to keep order. There should have been military rule and an absolute focus on keeping order. The latter failure, which resulted from the closing down of the Iraqi army, explains the situation that we are in.

We have to get out of this situation, which is a disaster for the middle east and for the people of Iraq. The answer is the same as that which should have been secured at the time: a proper UN mandate and lead; international engagement; getting more countries involved; greater legitimacy; and a proper interim Iraqi Government who are recognised as legitimate by the whole international community.

That is the story. I and my Department made full preparations for the proper reconstruction of Iraq, but I am afraid that our country and Prime Minister did not stand up to the Americans when the Pentagon, in its full arrogance, brushed aside the preparations made in its own country through the State Department, and led us into the chaos that we now see.

5.17 pm

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate, albeit briefly. I intend to focus my comments on a small but none the less important part of defence policy that is often neglected—defence logistics—but first I should like to make a couple of general comments. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on producing an intelligent White Paper that leads the way for future defence policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) referred to the number of strategic reviews. Unfortunately, that is an indication of the times that we live in. The security environment is changing so rapidly that there will be an increasing number of reviews over time. I also congratulate the Secretary of State on securing from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a real-terms increase in the defence budget.

I should also congratulate the shadow Defence Secretary on putting on such a brave face this afternoon, in the full knowledge of the impossibility of defending the policy that he will have to defend. I might disagree with him and his Front-Bench colleagues, but I recognise that they are committed to defence policy and to defending this country. I therefore understand the embarrassment that they must be experiencing, but it is not my intention to exploit it this afternoon.

Mr. Blunt: Following the Chancellor's Budget statement, my noble Friend Lord King sought clarification from the Treasury concerning a real-terms increase in defence spending. However, he discovered no such undertaking, beyond what had already been announced in the previous comprehensive spending review. If that proves correct, I should imagine that the hon. Gentleman, like me, will regard it as something of a let-down.

Mr. Smith: We await the Chancellor's statement with interest. My understanding is that a commitment to the defence of this country—something that I believe in strongly—has been given, and I look forward to hearing what the Chancellor says.

I shall confine my remarks to defence logistics. It is often forgotten that nearly half the entire defence budget goes on logistics and not an awful lot of time is spent debating the £15.2 billion—at 2003 out-turn prices—involved. About £11.4 billion of that expenditure is currently under review as part of an MOD end-to-end review of air and land logistics. I support that vital review, the general objective of which is to reduce the footprint of logistics to prevent duplication, to ensure faster response times and to secure the equipment and support where and when it is necessary.

The National Audit Office report on Operation Telic identified the need to achieve those tasks and it concluded that the operation was a huge logistical success. It was the fastest deployment—within 10 weeks—of the largest British expeditionary force ever into a theatre, a very austere environment, nearly 4,000 miles away. There was even a change of location. We therefore deployed people even more quickly than the planning assumptions for the deployment would have suggested.

The NAO rightly recognised some capability gaps within that deployment, but did not do so in respect of fixed-wing aircraft, which were deployed very successfully into the field. I am particularly interested in air support and the role of third-line reinforcement and support for operational aircraft that need to be put rapidly into the field and maintained there.

Government policy in that respect has been incredibly innovative over the past few years and has created the so-called trading funds. The Defence Aviation Repair Agency whose headquarters are in my constituency is one example, and there are other bodies such as the Army Base Repair Organisation, ABRO, which play a vital strategic role in ensuring that we get our logistics act together.

Ministers will be aware that yesterday's announcement of up to 550 redundancies at DARA at RAF St. Athan in the Vale of Glamorgan in the next 12 months was received with disappointment and dismay by my constituents and that work force. We should acknowledge the crucial role that these guys play in the logistical chain of depth air support. Indeed, they were somewhat taken aback. These are highly skilled workers, vital to support our front line—and I repeat that the NAO identified no faults whatever in the logistical support for our fixed-wing aircraft in Operation Telic in Iraq.

About 360 of those jobs are to be lost as efficiency savings—that was the explanation given. The work force and I accept that some efficiency savings have to be made, but we do not agree that such a large loss of highly skilled workers is necessarily the best way of achieving them. Incidentally, the depletion of such an important skills base—in military aeronautical engineering—is a severe sting, especially given that the organisation will be expected, after 1 April this year, to compete in the marketplace with no vote money and not a penny from the taxpayer for its future work. Losing those skills is a worry.

However, the second half of the decision is what worried me and many of the DARA workers at St. Athan. That was the announcement of 190 redundancies because the contract to upgrade the Harrier platform had been lost. The contract went to RAF Cottesmore, and that astonished many workers. They believed that the purpose behind the creation of DARA, the trading fund in the logistical chain of support, was to civilianise the crucial deep repair operations—the garage or depot operations inherent in the overhaul and maintenance of fighter aircraft.

Civilianising that work, and taking it away from RAF personnel, was supposed to mean that it could be carried out in a commercial environment, and on a par with any player in the private sector. Workers were shocked to hear that the contract had gone back to the RAF because the work is now to be completed in-house, even though so much effort had gone into ensuring that DARA was competitive and in a strong position to enter the marketplace after 1 April.

Another concern is the nature of the end-to-end review. I have said that it is important to carry out that review, as so much of defence expenditure goes on logistics. Freeing up some of that money would mean that it could go on front-line services. Our forces could then be released to do what they do best—war fighting, or preparing for war fighting or peacekeeping—and that they could perform those tasks unhindered.

The suspicion at DARA about the end-to-end review has several causes. First, the trading funds were not originally included in the review. They were introduced after the review had begun, and it was not thought that they would be included in the MOD logistical chain, as a solution had been found. Creating a trading fund meant that the resulting commercial organisation could compete with other players in the market. Why has the work been returned to the MOD logistical chain? The people at DARA regard the decision as more or less an afterthought.

The second cause of nervousness about the end-to-end review is that, although its team leader has a distinguished record in the armed forces, he is not noted for his support or sympathy for the newly created trading fund and its role in providing air support for the RAF. Another consideration is that the specialist teams that decide the contracts are predominantly made up of military representatives from the forces. There is therefore a belief that there could be a bias in the decision-making process. I do not say that I subscribe to that belief, but I have heard that view expressed by workers at DARA, where there is the prospect that 550 jobs will be lost.

In future, there will be competition for major contracts, such as that for the Tornado GR9 structures. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will not be able to say how that will turn out, as the review is still under way and the decision has not been taken. However, I want to be able to reassure the highly skilled workers at DARA, who play an absolutely vital role in providing logistical support, that future contract allocations will be transparent. In that way, wherever a contract is eventually placed, those workers will be able to see whether the bid that they put in was strong and economical, or weak. That will be the difference between winning and losing any such contracts.

The House will accept that we must not lose the skills that I am talking about, so it is possible that there could be a strategic reason to maintain them at military bases as a second-line reinforcement. If that is the case, a transparent contract allocation process would allow workers to understand the reasoning behind decisions. It is vital that any future decisions be transparent and seen to be transparent.

[Mr. Smith]

If decisions are made on that basis, the Defence Aviation Repair Agency, which has shed half its work force in the past four to five years without a single compulsory redundancy, and is virtually doing the same volume of work with half the work force, will be fit, lean, mean and capable to compete successfully in the marketplace with any organisation in the world on military aviation. Given all that it has achieved, and in recent years it has jumped through hoops to become efficient and competitive, it needs those assurances. Finally, it would also like to know why it did not win the Harrier platform contract that was announced yesterday.

5.31 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): First I thank all the hon. and right hon. Members who have paid tribute to my late noble and gallant Friend Lord Vivian. He was a very splendid man indeed and the tributes paid to him today fully reflect that. I intend to send his widow a copy of today's Hansard, so that she may read for herself the tributes paid to him in this House.

We have had a typically robust and interesting debate, sadly not as well attended as we would have wished. The usual groupies are here. We give a special welcome to the one or two new Friends who have joined us, and hope that they will come back and join us again. I say that much as they do at services in church on a Sunday. I hope that those who have not participated so enthusiastically in the past will come back. In particular I welcome the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), the former Secretary of State for International Development. I do not always agree with her, but I have found her to be a personable friend across the Floor and it was interesting to hear from her.

Time is marching on, so if the House will forgive me I will not go through all the speeches that were made. I put it on record once again that the deliberations of the Defence Committee have done credit to that Committee, to the House and to the parliamentary system. It was an extremely well-informed report that contributed significantly to all our understanding of the conduct of the Iraq war.

A number of people, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), remarked on the lack of detail in the White Paper. My right hon. Friend rightly described it as a menu without prices. Like him, I too have a major BAE Systems operation in my constituency and my constituents are concerned about the uncertainties surrounding a number of programmes. The reasons for publishing the White Paper are encapsulated in supporting essay 2. Paragraph 2.9 states:

"Since SDR our Armed Forces have conducted operations that have been more complex and greater in number than we had envisaged. We have effectively been conducting continual concurrent operations, deploying further afield, to more places, more frequently and with a greater variety of missions than set out in the SDR planning assumptions. We expect to see a similar pattern of operations in the future."

In other words, the Government expect multiple, concurrent, small to medium-scale operations such as counter-terrorism, counter-proliferation operations and enduring peace support operations well beyond the assumptions of the strategic defence review to be the norm, without creating overstretch.

The White Paper also recognises the need to retain the ability to undertake a large-scale operation such as Operation Telic, although in his statement to the House in December the Secretary of State accepted that expeditionary operations on that scale can be conducted effectively only if United States forces are engaged. That leads to the further essential requirement set out in the White Paper, of inter-operability with the United States.

The blunt message of that policy was summed up by Bronwen Maddox in The Times:

"Britain will never again fight a big war on its own, as it did in the Falklands."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) said, it is a matter of betting the shop on the United States.

Notwithstanding that brutal assessment, the Government's ambitions are markedly greater than in 1998, and the White Paper must be judged against the revised range of assumptions. We have no reason to disagree with the threat assessments. We believe that the United Kingdom should be prepared to play an important role in the less stable, post-cold war world—but if the UK wants to play in that league, there is a price tag. We are not convinced that the solutions proposed meet the challenge that the Government have set themselves. Nor do we believe that the Government are prepared to pay the price that goes with effective application of the policy. Like the Chief of the Defence Staff, we look forward to the Chancellor's detailed announcements on spending in July.

A widespread view shared at senior military level is that the strategic defence review was underfunded. The White Paper proposes an even more ambitious military posture, yet—despite the Chancellor's rhetoric—the additional resources do not meet the increased ambition.

Taken together with the acceptance that high technology in the form of network-enabled capability must be an essential component of the new scenario, the Government's enhanced ambitions have put the screws on our conventional forces—the reason for talk of platform numbers being less relevant. If we are to be prepared for the envisaged increase in operations, something has to give. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), who was in such good form today, said in December:

"We are concerned that a whole raft of decisions on cuts in both manpower and equipment will start to leach out later."—[Official Report, 11 December 2003; Vol. 414, c. 1213.]

Since then, the press has been awash with speculation that whole aircraft types will be taken out of service, regiments axed and the maritime fleet reduced in size. The Government have already drunk the Territorial Army well dry, thanks to their ridiculous policy of cutting the TA down to about 18,000. Fortunately, the cut is not as much as the Secretary of State envisaged, and he was relieved—and said so publicly.

We know that the Ministry of Defence is undertaking studies in 14 so-called work strands with a view to meeting the cost savings demanded by the Treasury. We were assisted by the Minister of State in the other place yesterday:

"To manage the in-year pressures, we have had to scale back cash expenditure across the department, in particular in the Defence Logistics Organisation and the Defence Procurement Agency . . . It is clear that during both next year and the year after we shall continue to face financial pressures. We are conducting an assessment of where reductions in planned expenditure can be made in each of those years so that we can continue to live within our means . . . So I am not in a position to be able to tell noble and gallant Lords and the House generally what figures are being bandied about but I think that I have been fairly frank with the House in going as far as I have."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 March 2004; Vol. 659, c. 743–744.]

The Minister, by admitting serious financial pressures, was probably too frank for some of his colleagues. For all the attacks directed at us, the Government are struggling to maintain their existing commitments—let alone the increased commitments envisaged in the White Paper.

If our forces are to undertake the range of operations foreseen in the White Paper, platform numbers and boots on the ground will matter. The Government are engaged in a series of gambles in a desperate attempt to square the circle. They have taken a gamble with the early withdrawal of the Sea Harrier starting next week, thereby removing Britain's independent maritime air defence capability. On present projections, that capability gap will be at least six years—longer if the new carrier programme is delayed. We may be looking at 10 years without full fleet air defence. The Minister ought to say whether he agrees that aircraft could remain in service until 2012 without an engine upgrade.

It has been reported that the Government are to cut the number of Type 45 destroyers from 12 to as few as nine or eight, vastly reducing Britain's maritime capability and reach. Numbers do count, as the Minister will understand when he recalls that the frigate deployed to Sierra Leone a few years ago was also on standby for the Falklands and the Caribbean. For those without a map, those areas are several thousand miles apart. Will the Government clarify their position on the Type 45s? Do they intend to procure the 12 vessels originally envisaged or will we have to wait until those work strands have reported?

On the future rapid effects system—FRES—the Government are gambling on a programme that is central to achieving the aims set out in the White Paper. FRES is a clear example of the fact that the development of a medium-weight capability is essential to the expeditionary role envisaged in the White Paper. That was reflected in the early in-service date and high-priority status afforded to it. However, the Government have not yet even decided what they want from the programme, let alone how to procure it. By putting it out to a systems house, the Government could have added anything up to a year to the process, kicking a final decision ever further into the long grass and making the prospect of FRES reaching its early in-service date remote.

There are other examples, with which Ministers will be only too familiar. Two of the six Astute submarines are said to be on the chopping block, which would reduce our maritime capability still further and deal another blow to the Ministry's favourite contractor, BAE Systems. Up to 40 Challenger tanks may be mothballed, curtailing capabilities further. Ark Royal is to go into some kind of mothballing and the joint strike fighter—now called the joint combat aircraft—could be cut from 150 to 110. It is a key component for the carriers and it would helpful if Ministers could answer some of the concerns that have been expressed on both sides of the House about those programmes today.

On a note of agreement, I can say that we support the carriers. The carrier programme that the Government have developed will be essential to the concept of expeditionary warfare that they advocate. I welcome the fact that the drumbeats in the jungle suggest that the carrier size has gone back up to 60,000 tonnes. That will result in serious carriers that are capable of delivering what we all want to see. However, there is uncertainty about the programme. We have heard reports that the MOD wants to take control of the programme, instead of making BAE Systems the prime contractor, or to hand it over to AMEC. Despite having the excellent Syd Gillibrand as its leading light, that company has not had great experience in running such a programme.

The Government are also ransacking the cupboard for other savings. Earlier this week, the Under-Secretary smuggled out a written statement, blandly called "Estate Rationalisation: Presentation Strategy", the key sentence of which reads:

"The work now underway is looking at consolidating defence activity at a smaller number of more densely utilised locations in order to achieve the optimum use of land and facilities . . . it will take into account existing relocation studies that have already been announced."

As the Member of Parliament for Aldershot, I hope that the Minister can tell me whether the review will apply to Aldershot and Tidworth, which are currently the subject of Project Connaught, which will see more than 25 per cent. of the Aldershot garrison sold for housing. If there is to be a further fire sale of military assets, where will the Government house the 8,000 troops they will bring back from Northern Ireland under that peace dividend? Where will the 20,000 troops presently in Germany be stationed if they are pulled back—as they will be at some point? Will not a policy of super garrisons substantially reduce the military footprint in the UK?

The White Paper sets out the Government's projections for the next 15 years. Admittedly, the last White Paper lasted only six years, but it is still a basis for today's discussions. The projections anticipate a level of military action similar to the recent pattern, which is well in excess of the level envisaged by the SDR just six years ago, and they do not fully quantify the effect of Islamic fundamentalist terrorism on our country. The truth is that manpower has been cut, increasing pressure on young service families. Training has been cut. The TA is running out of people to support the regulars. Numbers of aircraft, ships and armour are being reduced and assets are being sold.

Despite the dangerously uncertain world that we have entered, Ministers are taking gambles that capability gaps will not be exposed. They have failed to order essential battlefield equipment in time. The defence industrial policy, about which my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde spoke so comprehensively, is, to quote a senior industrialist, "a shambles". We have received no tangible dividend for the Prime Minister's support for the United States. As my right hon. Friend said, there should at least be a technical access agreement on the joint strike fighter. Where is that? What answer can the Minister give us about control of the British defence industrial base if that control is moving inexorably into the hands of the Americans? As we know, they have done us no favours in the commercial field. Political correctness inhibits training and the development of risk awareness.

All those points were summed up in the brutally frank admission made yesterday by the Prime Minister's personal adviser on defence, the Chief of the Defence Staff: the Army has been stretched to breaking point and cannot mount another Iraq-scale war for five years.

Let us hope our enemies are not listening.

5.46 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): In opening the debate, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State drew the attention of the House to the key security challenges that we face. The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) recognised that, and I think that he echoed both the analysis and some of the conclusions of the White Paper. The hon. Gentleman could not be in the Chamber for the wind-ups as he had a speaking engagement. My best guess is that he is speaking to the shadow Chancellor to try to find out some of the answers that he failed to give in response to contributions from the Labour Benches.

The challenge that we face on defence is ensuring that we have the right military capabilities to meet the threats we are likely to face. The 1998 strategic defence review and the new chapter that we published in 2002 undoubtedly moved our armed forces in the right direction. But as others have recognised—in the debate and elsewhere—the world does not stand still; nor should our response.

The Defence White Paper, "Delivering Security in a Changing World" sets out the case for the development of more flexible and agile armed forces, which are structured and equipped to deploy rapidly in the most likely small and medium-scale operations, from war fighting to giving enduring peace support. Much of the White Paper presages change for the armed forces and for defence. Painful as it may be, we must not shirk from making tough choices. As the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) indicated, my noble Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement made that clear in his contribution to a debate in the other place yesterday.

Mr. Blunt: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: I have to reply to a large number of contributions, but if there is time later, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

In the last spending review, we announced the largest sustained increase in planned defence spending for about 20 years, yet, however great the increase in the budget, we cannot do everything to the nth degree. Some contributions to the debate seemed to ask for everything; nothing should go, and nothing should be given in return. Those are not useful contributions to such a heavyweight and important debate. It is easy to ask for things, but it is vital to have balance in our thinking on investment in running the Ministry of Defence, as it is for every spending Department.

When the Conservatives were in power, they had to make changes and choices that were similar to those that face us now. That had to be done in 1995, and I think that it was the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex who said that the Conservatives got some of those decisions wrong. He did not enumerate the decisions or point out where the Conservatives had gone wrong. I could certainly list a good number of things; we have had to recover from many of those decisions and find solutions.

Mr. Blunt: In fact, I made those remarks. The errors that I identified were in recruiting and the Defence Medical Services.

In a mature debate about defence, everyone must accept that tough choices have to be made. A better approach for the Ministry of Defence would be to ensure that the debate was much more transparent and that there was much more information. My experience was that "Front Line First" was a much more open exercise; it was much easier to manage politically because it was transparent. I hope that the Ministry of Defence will take that advice.

Mr. Ingram: It is tempting to think in that way. However, as we know from some of the speculation that abounds, which is immediately latched on to by hon. Members and others, such arguments are not balanced. Those who use them simply consider one aspect and say, "This is nonsense and cannot be sustained." Of course, something will not necessarily go simply because it has been part of the consideration. Military personnel themselves are the best analysts of all this, as the hon. Gentleman will know from his background as adviser to Malcolm Rifkind, the then Secretary of State for Defence. Some tough choices must be made, but the quality of their advice is very high. They know that judgments have to be made. They advise Ministers, and they respect Ministers when we stand our ground on some issues. It is tempting to say that the necessary debate must be open and transparent, but I am not sure whether that would add to the quality of the judgment that must be made; we would chase a lot of hares unnecessarily.

We have a commitment to ensure that the quality of judgments taken is properly bottomed out and scrutinised. We then have to stand accountable for those judgments. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has shown time and again that he is more than prepared to take many of those tough decisions and to see them through against some strong criticism. We must ensure that we direct our finite resources at those capabilities that are best able to deliver the full range of military effects that we require. In doing so, we must be rigorous in dispensing with those capabilities that do not fit our requirements—to do otherwise is simply not an option.

I shall deal with some of the various issues that right hon. and hon. Members have raised. I welcome all the contributions made by the hon. Members for Mid-Sussex, for Hereford (Mr. Keetch), for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Aldershot and the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), as well as those made by my hon. Friends the Members for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire), for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard), for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short). I do not agree with all the contributions that have been made, and I do not know whether I can deal with all of them in the time available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax asked about the status of troops injured in the incidents on Monday. Fourteen troops were hospitalised. Four may have to be returned to the United Kingdom, but the injuries were not as severe as the images suggest. The quality of the equipment that we use in dealing with such riot-control situations is high grade, and our troops are highly trained. Again, the images sometimes belie the reality on the ground. All hon. Members would wish those who have been injured a full recovery. We wish them well.

Let me deal with the points made by the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex. I want to be kind to him. In a sense, he set out a shopping list: more expenditure on training, equipment and service personnel generally. He believes that deeply, but he has to match his dreams with reality. He had to do so when he held the job that I now hold. He had to make some tough choices, and we now have to recover from those very same choices. I believe that he is in denial about the Conservative party's expenditure planning. No one has rebutted the fact that there would be a £1.5 billion cut in defence spending. That is the implication of what the shadow Chancellor has said. He must face up to that realistically. He called for many things, but he has to set that against what his own party is saying about expenditure.

I have always taken the view that the role of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition is to do one thing only: to train to become Her Majesty's Government. So the Opposition have to face up to the consequences of what they say. Our years in opposition certainly allowed the Labour party to go through that process. I wish the Conservative party a longer time in opposition because they have clearly not begun to deal with some of the hard issues that they must face.

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex asked about the capacity to deal with the terrorist threats facing this country. General Jackson, the Chief of the General Staff, outlined to the Defence Committee yesterday the arrangements for the forces to exercise with the emergency services. We must increasingly consider that issue and take into account what can be done in relation to the public's perception. Training and exercise does not necessarily mean that the scenario envisaged will happen the next day. We have to manage all this, and there is a strong commitment between the emergency services and MOD personnel to work through many of the difficult scenarios that we may have to face.

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex also alleged that there had been a 50 per cent. cut in combined arms training. Those claims are without foundation. We fully recognise the importance of combined arms training. An important element of recuperating and sustaining military capability rests on getting that right and ensuring that we are investing in that area. Let me give the assurance that we shall, of course, ensure that the issue is accorded the right priority in our future plans.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan is right that I made an announcement yesterday that had an effect on the Defence Aviation Repair Agency, which is in his constituency. I shall explain the background to that. I agreed that the Harrier air depth maintenance support work should roll forward to RAF Cottesmore as a centre of gravity for logistic support for the Harrier platform. This decision has been taken at this point, because of the need to protect the critical operation in-service date for the Harrier GR9. The decision is likely to affect, as my hon. Friend said, a further 190 posts in addition to those proposed as part of the Red Dragon efficiencies.

The solution at RAF Cottesmore offered the best value for money for defence, providing savings of more than £30 million through the life of the programme. Any delay in the decision would also have cost £800,000 a month. That is the problem that I faced, alongside the other developments that were taking place relative to the ongoing end-to-end review. I do not accept my hon. Friend's view that the inclusion of DARA and ABRO's trading funds in the end-to-end review was an afterthought. They cannot be anywhere other than in that review.

I make a commitment about Red Dragon and the review work. DARA has a future, but a future that is based on MOD expenditure and, increasingly and importantly, on what it can win in the private sector in terms of commercial business. That is the opportunity that the Red Dragon project affords DARA. There were those who said that we should not go ahead with that £70 million-plus investment. I made the decision because it gave the work force at DARA in St. Athan the best opportunity. I hear what my hon. Friend said about the other issues, but I am only too willing to meet him and local trade union representatives to talk the issue through to try to ease their fears. I am sure that he will welcome that invitation.

As ever, my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West made a thoughtful contribution. She is fierce in her role as a constituency Member of Parliament and is similar to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan. She never fails to mention Rosyth in the same way as he never fails to mention St. Athan. I recognise that Rosyth is important to her constituency, and I point out that Rosyth is mentioned in the future aircraft programme as one of the yards that will play a possible part in the process. However, it has to win its part of the contract. Free gifts are not being given to the shipyards. We must get best value and best price, so we say to all the yards that their future is also about winning the commercial business that is potentially out there for the British shipyard industry. The MOD's elements of that future are important, but the yards cannot survive on MOD work alone even with the largest warship-building programme for a generation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West also asked about recruitment. The whole Army's trained strength—

PETITION

Flooding

6 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I wish to seek leave to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Pickering in north Yorkshire. It was organised by the Yorkshire Evening Press and local flood campaigners following the decision by the Yorkshire regional flood defence committee not to pursue a flood defence scheme in Pickering for the present time, which it is felt is likely to mean that no flood defences will be built. The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of the Residents of Pickering, North Yorkshire

Declares that the town of Pickering experienced severe flooding on no less than three occasions in recent years, in March 1999, October 2000, and August 2002 with a devastating impact on residents, businesses and tourism; that following the October 2000 flood the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs agreed with the Environment Agency and the Yorkshire Regional Flood Defence Committee that a flood alleviation scheme for Pickering should be given priority; notes with concern and disappointment that such a scheme has not been developed and that the priority status of Pickering will expire on 31st March;

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for the Department of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to agree to extend the priority status of a Pickering flood alleviation scheme for a further two years and to request that the Regional Environment Agency for Yorkshire and the Humber and the Yorkshire Flood Defence Committee draw up revised plans for a flood alleviation scheme for Pickering without delay.

And the petitioners remain.

To lie upon the Table.

Economic Situation (Strangford)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kemp.]

6.2 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I should like first to place on record my utter condemnation of the mindless thugs who were responsible for an arson attack in my constituency, which totally destroyed three businesses and left approximately 30 local people out of work. I am sure that the Minister will share my relief that no one was injured, encourage the shopkeepers to open their businesses again, and appeal to the public to come forward with any information that could assist the police in apprehending those vandals.

I am grateful for having had the opportunity to secure this Adjournment debate. I thank Ministers for their attendance in the Chamber. I want to touch on a number of points that will highlight my concerns for the future economic prospects of my Strangford constituency, although I cannot divorce that from the impact of closures of factories in East Belfast, which abuts my constituency.

During the past five years, the constituency of Strangford has witnessed a colossal downturn in its indigenous manufacturing industries. The peace that was promised over five years ago has not been delivered, while the peace dividend, which was hyped up, has never really materialised. Industries and businesses, which have formed the foundation of the local economy, are now declining and disappearing at an alarming rate. If one takes into consideration the repercussions of the demise of Harland and Wolff and the huge losses from Bombardier-Shorts alone, the number of manufacturing jobs that have been lost to my constituents easily runs into tens of thousands. In the past 18 months, in excess of 5,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in the Strangford-East Belfast area, while the past 12 months show the figure of 1,500 for Strangford alone.

For ease of reference, I shall break up the constituency into the three council areas that cover Strangford. The Ards borough council district of my constituency has witnessed a constant decline in manufacturing in recent years. The loss of major employers such as the Crepe Weavers and the Lee factory means that the textile presence in the area has almost died out. Last year, Carpets International went to the wall, with the loss of 144 jobs at its Killinchy plant.

Through the fleet at Portavogie, we have witnessed the extreme problems faced by the fishing industry. In the past 10 years, the Northern Ireland fleet has shrunk by 30 per cent.; 84 vessels have been decommissioned since 1994. I am wholly convinced that our continued participation in the common fisheries policy will result in the industry's decline to a point from which it will be unable to recover. Only when the Faroese and Icelandic models are properly investigated and when this country once again commands authority over its national waters can we hope to see the resurgence of the fishing industry. In the meantime, fishermen participating in the voluntary tie-up scheme have failed to receive their compensation, despite being five weeks into this year's cod-recovery programme.

There are two major plans in the pipeline that will be of huge economic benefit to the Newtownards area. The first is the multi-million pound Castlebawn development, which will bring hundreds of new jobs and much-needed economic investment to the area. In addition, as part of its planning approval, the development will extend the local road network and alleviate the traffic congestion in and around the town. The other major plan, which has not yet been approved, is in connection with the location of a B&Q superstore on the site of the former Scrabo high school. The scheme will bring approximately 250 jobs to the Ards area. The proposal is tied up at the planning stage; last week, along with retail unit officials, I had a meeting with the chief executive of the Department of the Environment planning service to try to resolve a number of outstanding issues. I urge the Minister of the Environment in Northern Ireland to look sympathetically on the application and to take account of the cross-party support that it enjoys, not least because of the 250 jobs that it will create.

One indirect measure that could be taken to assist the local economy is the provision of an adequate roads infrastructure. I thank the Department for Regional Development, under its former Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), for the completion of phase 2 of the Comber bypass, which has gone some way to easing the traffic burden on the town, which actively dissuaded inward investment. The priority now for Comber is the provision of phase 3 of its bypass. Completion of phase 3 will greatly improve Comber's ability to attract much needed investment to the area.

The latest jobs blow to the dwindling manufacturing base in the Down district council area of Strangford has brought the total number of lay-offs in the area to almost 400 in just five months. International Leathers, based outside Killyleagh, says that job losses are the result of a major slow-down in the worldwide leather market. Since Christmas 2003, the company has laid off 37 workers, and the remaining 20 employees are on short time.

Also in the Down district council area, Saintfield Yarns, with 20 years' experience in textiles, was regarded as a modern, progressive, forward-thinking company in which working conditions were so positive that there was no need for union involvement on the site. The company had been experiencing increasing financial difficulties owing to the rise in energy costs, but it was the failure of the insurance sector to provide adequate cover that sounded the death knell, leading to the firm's closure and the loss of 250 jobs. Other companies in the area, such as Northern Ireland Plastics and McCleery's Yarns have been hard-pressed to remain financially viable and have had to implement severe rationalising programmes within their company structures to remain in business.

The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson) will understand my shock and despair when I learned that the Department of the Environment planning service had refused permission for the exciting and imaginative Gocean development in Killyleagh. The developer would inject £35 million of investment into the area, and would ensure the town's economic future well into the 21st century.

For decades, there has been a slow but constant decline in the manufacturing industries on which local communities depend, and Killyleagh is one such place. Industry prompted settlement in the area, but little has been done to attract new investment. The economic revitalisation of Killyleagh and its hinterland depends on the completion of the Gocean development. Construction jobs on the development would be assured for approximately nine years. The plan outlines a unique mix of social and private housing, as there is an overwhelming demand among local people to remain in Killyleagh. The proposed nursing home would provide about 100 jobs for the town, and the marine, restaurant and chandlery would attract the tourist interest that Killyleagh deserves.

The development has the backing of the overwhelming majority of people in Killyleagh, all political parties and all Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. It also has my unreserved support as the Member of Parliament representing the constituency. The developer has spent considerable time and effort appealing against the decision to refuse permission, and the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), who has ministerial responsibility for the environment, has now—I believe—passed the matter to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for a ruling. I appeal to him for a positive response in his deliberations. I cannot overemphasise the importance of the proposal to the future economic and social well-being of the Killyleagh area; it is fair to say that the Government will not invest £35 million over a number of years.

The people of Castlereagh borough have always been intimately connected to the industries of East Belfast. They have suffered equally from the demise of Harland and Wolff, which once employed 30,000 people. More recently, the downturn in fortunes at Bombardier-Shorts has resulted in the loss of thousands of jobs over the past few years. The latest bombshell came only a few weeks ago, when TK-ECC, the constituency's largest private employer, announced that it was closing, with the loss of almost 1,000 jobs in its final year. That has had a truly devastating effect on the wider community. In many cases, more than one member of the same family was employed at TK-ECC, and in one instance five members of a single extended family were affected.

Some TK-ECC employees came from industries that had closed down. Every time a factory closes, opportunities for employment decline, and if action is not taken to address the situation, our local manufacturing industry may simply disappear. To compound the trauma of redundancy, over a few weeks it has come to light that there is a £32 million hole in the TK-ECC pension fund, which only rubs salt into the wounds of a loyal and committed work force.

TK-ECC did not go bankrupt; it was simply axed by its parent company, Takata, which is now offering a paltry £6 million towards the deficit. There are major concerns about the disposal of land then owned by the industrial development board. In 1995, TK-ECC purchased 23 acres adjacent to its factory in Dundonald for £1.5 million on a freehold lease. In February 1996, that land was sold to a Netherlands-based sister company, TREK-VB, for the princely sum of £2.25 million. Investigations by independent sources suggest that, with planning permission, that land is worth about £20 million.

A company has therefore come to Northern Ireland, taken advantage of generous Government grants and been sold 23 acres of Government land on the premise that it was for business development. It has then sold the land for a profit of £750,000 to a company in the same group, which has abandoned its Dundonald work force and is free to sell the land for its own financial gain. It is alleged that Takata will fulfil its pension obligations only if the land is re-zoned and sold for residential development.

So if we retain that precious land for future industrial use, 550 people will be robbed of their full pension entitlements. Alternatively, if it is re-zoned for housing development, the industrial land bank in Dundonald will disappear and there will be no prospect of attracting new industries to the area. That is astounding, and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment must accept full responsibility for selling the land without any conditions or limitations on its future use. The onus is on the DETI to sort out the mess.

There is equal concern about the provision of industrial land throughout my constituency. Although I acknowledge the expansion that is due to take place at the Ballyharry business park in Newtownards, the Strangford constituency, not least in Castlereagh, has little land zoned for industrial use. That must be addressed if we are serious about encouraging inward investment.

Energy costs are another cause of major concern for Northern Ireland industry. A report carried out last year by the CBI confirmed that on average Northern Ireland business is paying 50 per cent. more than its mainland counterparts. For some companies the figure is more than 90 per cent. Reducing electricity prices to industry must be a priority and urgent action must be taken by Government to address the issue. Public service obligation and system security charges must therefore be minimised to ensure that Northern Ireland pays similar unit costs to mainland business. A transparent and pro-competitive restructuring of current long-term contracts must be completed urgently, and be assisted by Government finance to help deliver competitive indigenous generation. A review of how the costs of the Moyle interconnector are recovered must be undertaken to ensure that expenditure remains reasonable.

I challenge the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Investment to explain why the remit of the integrated development fund has been restricted to West Belfast and Londonderry. To date, the DETI has shown little interest in pursuing any sort of strategic approach to the matter, or in exploring new innovative avenues to address the decline in Strangford. Neither the Minister nor his departmental officials displays any sense of urgency on addressing the decline of our manufacturing industry and the loss of so many thousands of jobs.

If 5,000 jobs had been lost in, say, West Belfast, Strabane or Londonderry, there would be a markedly different response from the DETI. Instead, there seems to be a fundamental unwillingness to develop a strategic approach to the crisis. The Department seems more concerned with re-routing investment to nationalist areas of the Province, at the continued expense of areas such as Strangford. I wish to make it clear that I have no difficulty with nationalist areas attracting new investment, but I do object to an uneven playing field and the needs of my constituency being ignored continually. One wonders what must happen in the area before the DETI sits up, takes notice and acts to deal with the crisis. The inherent danger associated with the continuing decline of our traditional industries is that we are not only losing jobs but witnessing the removal of opportunities for future employment and skills development and retention.

In conclusion, taking into account the extra financial burdens placed on Northern Ireland's manufacturing industry in comparison with the rest of the UK in areas such as insurance and energy costs, it is crucial that the Government adopt a long-term strategic view on these matters. I therefore take this opportunity to call for the development and implementation of a specialised Department-led initiative to tackle the crisis in the sector. If we fail to take action now, there is a real danger that the area's skills base will decline to the point where the local manufacturing industry could implode.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs Robinson) on securing this Adjournment debate. At the outset, I join her in condemning the arson attack in her constituency and the killing that took place in Newtownards yesterday.

I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her comments and for raising her concerns about the current economic situation in her constituency, and it is important that I respond to a number of those points. Although I accept that there have been a number of regrettable job losses in her constituency over the past few years—she mentioned some of them—I would not want her or anyone else in Northern Ireland to think for a moment that the Government do not care about them, and I reject entirely her view that the playing field is uneven. Invest Northern Ireland is active in her constituency, and, in the time available, I should like to explain some of the positive things that the Government are doing to help her constituents.

The hon. Lady mentions last month's announcement that TK-ECC is to close its Dundonald operation with the loss of 550 jobs. That is regrettable, and I share the hon. Lady's concerns about the effects on those who are losing their jobs and the impact on their families and the wider community. The difficulties facing the company had been evident for some time, and Invest Northern Ireland had worked closely with management to try to find a way to resolve those issues. However, despite that approach and the hard work done by the local management team and the work force to make TK-ECC more competitive, all those considerable efforts were not enough to prevent the German parent company deciding to close its Dundonald subsidiary and transfer production to Romania.

The Government's priority has been to provide immediate help and support to those being made redundant, and that facility is already providing a comprehensive range of advice and guidance to all those affected, including information on job vacancies, help in completing job applications and details of social security benefits. Comprehensive as that support structure is, however, it cannot substitute for actual jobs, and I assure the hon. Lady that everything possible is being done to assist TK-ECC's work force to find alternative employment.

The hon. Lady mentioned a number of specific issues, and she will know that a meeting has taken place. Officials in my Department are well aware of the pensions situation, and are in discussions with the trustees and the company, so it would be inappropriate for me to comment further.

On the disposal of the land, the hon. Lady knows that a decision was taken back in 1995 to sell the land. It was Government policy at that time to sell fully developed sites, which—I have checked the records—was done at fair market value. I have various criticisms of the previous Conservative Government, but they cannot be criticised for selling that property on the cheap.

Although that closure announcement and other closure announcements are a major blow, much positive progress has been made in the hon. Lady's constituency in recent years. In February 2004, unemployment in her constituency stood at 2.6 per cent. That is lower than the 3.2 per cent. average for Northern Ireland, and it ranks Strangford as the constituency with the joint-6th lowest claimant count rate out of Northern Ireland's 18 parliamentary constituencies.

Invest Northern Ireland is building on the growth that has taken place in the hon. Lady's constituency. The agency is very active, with around 110 client companies employing more than 5,000 people. Since it was set up in 2002, it has offered more than £3 million of assistance to companies in Strangford, which have brought forward projects with a total investment of more than £12 million. To date, it has assisted around 270 business start-ups in the area—an encouraging indication of the scope for supporting and developing a more entrepreneurial culture.

We have limited time in this debate, and it is not possible to refer to all the successful companies in Strangford, but let me single out one example to help to demonstrate the innovative and entrepreneurial culture that exists in the constituency. That company is Bridgedale Outdoor, which employs around 70 people in Newtownards. Bridgedale's innovative high-added-value technical socks for extreme sports have made the company a leading player in the outdoor clothing sector. Its products are sold across the world through a distribution network taking in more than 44 countries, from Australia to the Americas. The company is an excellent example of how a forward-thinking company can survive and thrive in the challenging textiles and clothing sector. Invest Northern Ireland has helped Bridgedale to become a key player in its field. The support that it offers to many companies in Strangford covers a broad range of measures aimed at helping businesses to increase their capability and to develop their international competitiveness.

Invest Northern Ireland's business improvement team helps companies in Strangford to enhance their competitiveness in the marketplace. The Compete programme provides support for innovative market-led products and manufacturing processes. Invest Northern Ireland actively works with councils in the constituency to help to achieve the most appropriate solutions for local needs. Its client companies in Strangford have recorded overall sales of £965 million over the past two years, of which £817 million represents external sales—goods sold outside Northern Ireland—and £512 million represents export goods sold outside the UK.

As a Government, we are directly enabling the provision of land for industrial development. Invest Northern Ireland's main holding is 4.6 acres at Newtownards, and around a further 24 acres are zoned for development at Comber. I assure the hon. Lady that the Government continue to be committed to the continuing economic development of the Strangford constituency, just as we are committed to the economic development and future prosperity of Northern Ireland as a region.

The hon. Lady raised several planning issues and mentioned roads in Comber. The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), will have heard her comments on planning matters, for which she has direct ministerial responsibility.

The hon. Lady mentioned high electricity prices in Northern Ireland. I have been extremely concerned about that issue during my time as a Northern Ireland Minister. Last year, I announced a proposal whereby electricity prices for non-domestic users will fall by 10 per cent. I am optimistic that we will be able to make progress on implementing that proposal. Northern Ireland Electricity recently announced a freeze in non-domestic prices. That is the first instalment of the Government's action.

The hon. Lady mentioned the fishing industry. I am aware of the problems that the industry has faced in Portavogie, Kilkeel and Ardglass in her constituency. Those areas have come under significant pressure, which involves not just the fishing community but the wider community at the southern end of the Ards peninsula. As she will recall, I established a taskforce in January 2003 to address the socio-economic effects of some of the changes taking place in the fishing industry. The hon. Lady mentioned the integrated development fund and she might, perhaps, have forgotten that that fund also applies to the fishing villages taskforce. I have already indicated that money from the fund—up to £5 million—will be made available for a package of measures to support the fishing communities of County Down, including Portavogie.

The hon. Lady also mentioned the proposed tie-up scheme, which I am confident will be launched shortly. Our proposals are with the European Commission, from which we are awaiting final approval. The scheme is designed to provide some compensation to fishermen denied the opportunity to catch cod and other white fish in the Irish sea during the closure period, and it will inject up to £1.5 million into the Northern Ireland fishing industry. I know that several of the hon. Lady's constituents will be among those able to take advantage of the scheme, and we will implement it as quickly as possible once we have approval. That scheme is in addition to the most recent fishing vessels decommissioning scheme, for which I was able to provide £5 million last year and which has enabled a significant number of fishermen to leave the industry with dignity.

The hon. Lady will also be aware of the Cabinet Office strategy unit report on the fishing industry published today, which I welcome. I want to discuss its findings with the industry, and I need some time to study it, but it is a positive development, which shows the Government's commitment to a sustainable fishing industry for the long term.

The Government are committed to working in close partnership with local councils and other key stakeholders to promote the sustained economic development of the Strangford constituency. I welcome the hon. Lady's close interest in what the Government are doing to support jobs in her constituency, and I want to close by reassuring her that we will continue to work to promote economic prosperity in Strangford and—

Orders of the Day

Christmas Day (Trading) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.34 am

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am pleased to be able to propose the Bill and I thank its sponsors, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) and for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth)—who cannot be here this morning—my hon. Friends the Members for Warrington, North (Helen Jones), for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall), for Alyn and Deeside (Mark Tami) and for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson), and finally the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton).

The Bill has cross-party support in the House and has a lot of support in the country among trade unions and people working in the retail trade, but it also has resonance in the faith communities and the Churches, from whom I have received many letters of support. The Bill resonates with ordinary people who want to protect Christmas day as that one day in the year on which they can come together with their families to cherish a special day.

Christmas is about giving gifts, but many of us think it is more than just another shopping day. Certainly many in this House and the country do not think that giving gifts and the commercialism of Christmas should be at the expense of those who work in the retail industry. USDAW, the shop workers union, represents 2.6 million workers—not just in the retail trade, but in the distribution industry—and it supports the Bill, as do the main established Churches. Others, including campaigns such as Keep Sunday Special, support the Bill.

That is why the Bill is important. It would allow shop workers and those in the retail trade in England and Wales to spend Christmas day with their families, something that many, including MPs, take for granted.

The Bill would prevent large shops from opening on Christmas day and would simply correct an anomaly in the Sunday Trading Act 1994 that allows shops to open on Christmas day unless it falls on a Sunday. As people would expect, the Bill is based on the provisions of the 1994 Act. The Bill will adopt the same exemptions from prohibition as contained in the Act; those will include farm shops, motorcycle supply shops, stands and exhibitions, pharmacies for the sale of medicines, shops at airports and railway stations, shops servicing ocean-going liners, and shops at petrol stations and motorway service stations. If the prohibition from opening on Christmas day is broken, the occupiers shall be liable to conviction by fine not exceeding £50,000.

Larger shops are defined in exactly the same way in the Bill as in the 1994 Act. Therefore the definition of a large shop will be one with a relevant floor space over 280 sq m, or—for the traditionalists or Eurosceptics in the House—3,000 sq ft. In the same way, the definitions of retail customer and of shop are identical to those in the 1994 Act.

Clause 2 of the Bill sets out the enforcement provisions, which will be the responsibility of local authorities, who will appoint enforcement officers. As is outlined in the explanatory notes, the enforcement will lead to a potential increase in expenditure for local authorities, but the cost will be relatively negligible.

I am sure that hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that the inspectors who would enforce this Act would have the same powers as those under the 1994 Act. Those powers would allow inspectors to enter premises in a local authority area at all reasonable hours, to view them and to take copies of records relating to any business conducted there. It would be an offence for anyone to obstruct an inspector in carrying out his or her duties.

The Bill applies only to England and Wales. In Scotland, Christmas day trading is a matter for the Scottish Executive, and I understand that a similar Bill is currently being considered there.

The principles underlying the Bill have the support of the vast majority of the country's people. Christmas day should be a unique day—the one day in the year when people can come together with their families. The Bill seeks to preserve the special nature of that day. It would also, very importantly, protect the interests of those working in the retail trade. It has been suggested that the Bill is simply a trade union Bill, promoted by USDAW. As a Labour MP and a former trade union official I would have no problem with that, but I must stress that the Bill in fact has wider support, including from the Churches and ordinary members of the public. People would be making a great mistake if they thought that the Bill was just about shop workers.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The hon. Gentleman knows that I want to support him later, in the Lobbies if necessary, but just before he leaves that point, and in order not to delay the House further, will he accept that a significant number of Members on both sides, who were present in 1994 and who are practising Christians, want to protect both Easter and Christmas day? That protection should be continued. All the Bill does, in effect, is to enforce what was the will of the House at that time—without which the original Sunday Trading Bill would probably not have been passed.

Mr. Jones: As I was not in the House at that time, I cannot comment on the individual occasion; but I think that the hon. Gentleman is right. Most people assumed that the 1994 Act covered Christmas day, and that was certainly the sentiment of the House and of those Members who supported that Bill.

In December, I tabled early-day motion 327, which emphasised the need to protect and preserve the special nature of Christmas day and called on the Government to introduce legislation to do that. That early-day motion is supported by 199 right hon. and hon. Members of all political persuasions.

Another question that has been asked is why we should introduce the Bill now. There is evidence, from the shop workers union USDAW and other sources, that certain shops are starting to test the market and open on Christmas day. There is a danger that we could get a domino effect: once one or two shops start to open, others might start to do so as well. The market pressures on retailers could become so intense that people had to open, and before long, Christmas day would be the same as any other trading day.

This is the third time there has been an attempt to correct this anomaly in the 1994 Act. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich introduced a similar private Member's Bill in 2001, which again had cross-party support but unfortunately ran out of time because of the general election that year. The Bill was subsequently introduced in the other place by Lord Davies of Coity, and promoted in this House by my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes). I put on record my tribute to those hon. Friends for their work to date to promote their Bill, although it was, unfortunately, unsuccessful.

Following that failure, the Government went out to public consultation on the provisions, to find out what people thought about ending the anomaly in the 1994 Act. The consultation showed that the vast majority of supermarkets that would be affected by the provisions did not oppose them. Some 97 per cent. of respondents, of whom 15 per cent. were major retailers, said that they favoured the introduction of restrictions on Christmas day trading. Support for legislation also came from across the retail sector. Although the Association of Convenience Stores called on the Government to take the interests of small stores into account, its chief executive, David Rae, stated that the ACS supported the proposals to prevent larger shops from opening on Christmas day.

The Department of Trade and Industry has carried out a regulatory impact assessment on the effects of introducing restrictions on Christmas day trading, and its report clearly states that the effects would be negligible. However, as I have said, we should not ignore the possibility that once certain large retailers begin to open, others might follow suit. That domino effect has already begun. In 2000, large stores such as Sainsbury's and Woolworth's broke with tradition and carried out Christmas day opening trials in London, and there is evidence that other stores will try such experiments.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): We could reach the absurd situation, if that is the thin end of the wedge—

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Let us see the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Skinner: I am trying to address my hon. Friend, and trying to get in an appropriate position for the microphone.

We could finish up in the absurd situation not only of having shops open on Christmas day, but there being the likelihood of a reality TV programme showing the Member for Kensington and Chelsea working in Asda on Christmas day.

Mr. Jones: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is referring to the present right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Portillo) or the future one.

I draw the House's attention to the fact that certain non-food retailers such as Woolworth's are experimenting with Christmas day trading—so this is not just a matter of catering for people who find on Christmas day that they have run out of the odd jar of cranberry sauce or packet of stuffing. The main products of a store such as Woolworth's are non-food. Of course, we all agree that essential services must operate all year round, but I argue strongly that the opening of large supermarkets on Christmas day does not constitute an essential service. I do not know of any recorded instance of anyone starving to death because Sainsbury's was not open on Christmas day. If I, or any other hon. Member, had forgotten the Brussels sprouts or brandy butter, that would be a minor inconvenience, and we would have the option of eating something else. I do not see why families of shop workers should have to sacrifice Christmas day to avoid the inconvenience that I and others might suffer. I do not think that it is worth destroying the unique nature of Christmas day to cater for someone's slight inconvenience or absent-mindedness.

Today, 12 per cent. of employers give employees time off for Christmas shopping, so there is not a strong argument for giving people an extra day of the year—Christmas day—to complete their Christmas shopping.

The House and the nation need to ask whether the public price of ruining a unique, special day is worth paying to allow larger shops to open. Christmas day would then become just like any other day of the year. If it did become an ordinary shopping day like any other, there would also be a ripple effect in terms of costs to the taxpayer, because there would be an increase in traffic.

There would obviously be extra transport needs, and the ripple effect would go beyond retail into distribution and the manufacturers who supply the retail trade. Thousands of people could have their Christmas day ruined.

Obviously, in a free society, we need consumer choice, and the Bill retains that by allowing local convenience stores and stores under 3,000 sq ft to open, but it will protect what is a special day of the year.

Some argue that retail workers should have the choice to work voluntarily, but my experience and the evidence of shop workers suggest that voluntarism is a mythological concept. In practice, pressure is put on people, and if they do not volunteer to work on Christmas day they are victimised or made to feel that they are less committed to the company than fellow workers.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): What does the hon. Gentleman have to say about the role of the trade unions, and USDAW in particular, in protecting their members? I refer to the provisions of schedule 4 to the 1994 Act, which refer to Sundays, but which I believe are also relevant here. If there is victimisation, what is the union doing about it?

Mr. Jones: The union does sterling work in protecting its members in the retail trade, and I congratulate Sir Bill Connor on his campaign to protect workers in the retail trade from the attacks that they suffer every day. It is fine to say that people should be free to work on Christmas day, but many of the large stores are not unionised and employ very low-paid women workers, and it is not acceptable for them to be forced to work or face victimisation. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman is a libertarian, and we could discuss the hellish view of society that he favours, but I want to ensure that people have a genuine choice about whether to work on Christmas day.

Christmas day is a Christian holiday, but it also has a resonance for other faiths. It is a traditional time for families to come together and enjoy a special quiet day. It is right, in a predominantly Christian society, to recognise the Christian holidays. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich made that point eloquently last time this was debated in the House. There have been calls for other faith days to be celebrated, but I think that that would be impractical, and as a Christian nation we should recognise the Christian holidays first, allowing people of all faiths to enjoy them.

Phil Sawford (Kettering) (Lab): My eldest son worked in non-food retail for about eight years. On Christmas eve, he would arrive home shattered—exhausted. On Christmas day, all he wanted to do was rest and get some sleep before the mayhem of the sales that would start on Boxing day. That had an impact on the whole family. It is not just about trade unions, the Church or religion. Does my hon. Friend agree that the family is at the heart of this legislation?

Mr. Jones: I totally agree, and it is also about the individual. My hon. Friend is right to point out that people in the retail trade work very hard in December. They work long hours, seven days a week, and to add the further burden of Christmas day would be intolerable not only for their family life but for their health.

Britain was once described as a nation of shopkeepers, and some may argue that we have become a nation of shoppers, but I do not accept that this should extend to Christmas day. Christmas day trading would mean the end of the peace and quiet of people living in towns and near out-of-town retail centres. Surely people should be allowed at least one day of the year to enjoy their peace and quiet, even in modern Britain?

I urge hon. Members to support the Bill and ensure that we not only protect those working in the retail trade but preserve the unique nature of Christmas day—something that we have all taken for granted for a very long time.

9.56 am

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I am delighted to support the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) in his promotion of a very sensible and moderate measure. I am one of those anti-libertarian, old-fashioned Tories who rejoiced when Mrs. Thatcher's attempt to impose Sunday trading was defeated, and who deplored the fact that the—in so many ways—admirable John Major brought that Bill back. I voted against it again.

During the period before Sunday trading was imposed on us, we had a series of big stores flouting the rules, just as the hon. Gentleman described Woolworth and Sainsbury's doing on Christmas day. We all knew that it was the thin end of the wedge. We knew what would happen, and it did. I opposed Sunday trading as vigorously as I did because the one thing I did not want in this country was a high street Sunday. I said that if we passed the legislation, we would have one—and we have one.

Anyone who drives into London on a Sunday, as I frequently have to do now that we have these absurd new hours of the House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad that I have some support among Government Members. I find that London, which used to be quite pleasant on a Sunday, is now congested and crowded with people shopping.

That has all happened, and I am not so starry eyed as to believe that we can reverse it, much as I would like to do so. It is all part of the increasing secularisation of our society, with so many people living up to the old Oscar Wilde dictum of knowing the price of everything and the value of nothing. I deplore that. We do, however, have Christmas day. Occasionally, it falls on a Sunday—but only occasionally. The Bill is designed simply to carve out that one day.

It was the intention of most of my colleagues who supported Sunday trading that Christmas should not be invaded. The Sunday Trading Bill was, like so many Bills, not as well drawn as it should have been, so Christmas day, if it does not fall on a Sunday, is vulnerable. The Bill will redress that. It does so not only in the interests of the Christian Church, although I make no apology for saying that that is a good thing. We are, as the hon. Member for North Durham said, a Christian society, and we have an established Church. I am pleased that we do, and I hope that we will have one for many long years to come.

I might add that that is a view shared by many Muslims, Jews and people of other faiths. They respect the fact that we have an established Church. It is appalling that a country with an established Church should say that on one of its two greatest festivals, pressure—however direct or indirect—will be put on certain people to go to work, thereby driving a nail into family life.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman mentions the pressure on family life as a result of shops opening on Sundays, but is it not true that most shop workers are women, and that they already experience phenomenal pressure on Christmas day—as a result of getting the meal ready and ensuring that their families have a nice day—let alone having to work on it?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Of course they do, but it is the sort of pressure in which most families rejoice. It is the big meal of the year, and they enjoy preparing it and having their families around them. They want to be free to celebrate a traditional Christmas, and I want them to be free so to do, if that is their desire.

The Bill simply provides a safeguard for some of the least well paid in the community. Of course, it can be argued that there are those who always work on Christmas day. For example, a son of mine managed a hotel for some years and he was incredibly busy, but that was a matter of choice. I might say that there was always the opportunity for the guests—and indeed the staff—to go to church, but that is another point. But many shop workers are among the lowest paid, and although my libertarian right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) might say in his interjection, "What are the unions doing to protect their workers?"—

Mr. Forth: I did.

Sir Patrick Cormack: There are two answers to that question. I believe that they genuinely try to protect them, but there are insidious pressures, as we all know. The other answer, of course, was given to my right hon. Friend by the Bill's promoter: a lot of shop workers are not members of a union.

Mr. Forth: Why not?

Sir Patrick Cormack: As a libertarian, my right hon. Friend should jolly well welcome the fact that they are not. He tries to have it both ways all the time. He is the arch-maverick wrecker of Parliament.

Mr. Forth rose—

Sir Patrick Cormack: Had he not been so indiscriminate in his wrecking tactics when first we had a Labour Government with a large majority, keeping the House up night after night for spurious reasons, we would not now be suffering the current sitting hours. Frankly, he should realise that he, more than any other individual, has destroyed the parliamentary pattern, and he has destroyed enough. Now I shall give way.

Mr. Forth: I am glad of this opportunity to allow my hon. Friend to calm down a bit. He says that I am having it both ways. That is what I try to do all the time here, and I succeed at some times but not others. I am rather intrigued by his saying that the unions are doing their best to protect vulnerable workers, but that vulnerable workers who are being exploited choose not to join a union. There is a circularity in that argument that I find difficult to follow. If workers believe that unions can help them, they are free to join them, and if the unions are any good, they should be able to help them.

Sir Patrick Cormack: My right hon. Friend knows full well that that is not the reality of life. Many who work in such places do not necessarily wish to be members of unions, and others are subject to the insidious pressures to which I referred. We all know how that can be exerted; if someone will not do a certain thing, they will not get overtime. Or if the question of who is going to be laid off first arises, the answer is, "The person who is least flexible. We'll put them to one side."

This very modest Bill merely seeks to protect the people in my constituency, and in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who are most vulnerable. But it is not about the trade unions; it is about the fact that Christmas day is one of very few days of the year that are truly special for the vast majority of our people. It tries, very modestly, to ring-fence that speciality.

The hon. Member for Kettering (Phil Sawford) spoke about his son in the retail trade, and in doing so he illustrated just how commercial our society has become. Only a few years ago, not only Christmas day but Boxing day was special, and the earliest date for the sales was 27 or 28 December; now, throughout the country it is 26 December. [Interruption.] As we all know, the 24th has traditionally been a day of great commercial activity, and nobody objects to that, but when the tills closed at 6 o'clock on Christmas eve, they did so for a good two clear days. Now, they do not.

All that we are seeking to do is to put our constituents first. I ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst to do the same, and to say that they deserve this one day. Whether one lives in Bromley and Chislehurst, South Staffordshire, Bootle or Bognor, one is entitled to have Christmas day as a special day, and Parliament has a duty to ring-fence it. The Bill is modest and moderate and I hope that it will pass on to the statue book with great alacrity, and be enforced long before Christmas 2004. I hope that the Minister will, with commendable brevity, give his unreserved support to it. When my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) speaks, I hope that he will endorse—with perhaps even greater brevity—what the Minister says, and when the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) speaks, I hope that he will do the same. This is not a party issue but a national issue. It is a very small national cause, but an extremely worthy one, and I warmly commend the Bill.

10.6 am

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): I very much welcome the Bill and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on his choice. I agree with all the points that he eloquently made in support of it. When we passed the Sunday Trading Act 1994, which enabled large shops to open on Sundays for six hours, the House debated carefully the question of shops opening on Easter Sunday, and it took the firm decision to protect that as a special day. I do not recollect our discussing Christmas day, but perhaps that was because the legislation focused on Sundays, and because it was inconceivable to Members that large shops would open on Christmas day and that it would become just another shopping day. That was an oversight on our part. The Bill does away with that possibility by protecting Christmas day, which is the wish of the majority of people. In supporting the Bill we have the support of the British people, and I shall vote for it in the Lobby.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): This is a free vote issue for Liberal Democrats because it is a question of moral judgment, but I side with the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). He simply seeks to emulate existing legislation by extending it to Christmas day, so the question is merely whether one agrees with the underlying principle. In my contribution, I shall focus on why I do.

Members may be relieved to know that I, too, am a libertarian—in fact, I have been defined as such by the University of Hull. It determined that I have the most libertarian voting record of any member of my party, which in itself should be fairly liberal-minded, given its name.

In essence, libertarianism is defined as the freedom to live life and to harm oneself—as long as one can show that one is conscious of the harm that is thereby being done—but not to harm others. The harm principle is the core of this discussion, because it applies to those who are compelled by others to work on Christmas day. It is not intellectually rigorous to pretend that there is no harm involved in making people work on Christmas day. I should tell those who oppose the legislation that it is not about unions.

We certainly could have a debate about what the unions have done and want to do, but that would be a sideshow and distraction from the Bill. Furthermore, the debate is not really about deciding whether other creeds or religions should have the same representation—not least because we are discussing a clearly defined issue here. We can always debate those issues—they are not mutually exclusive—in different circumstances. Given that Britain already has fewer public holidays than just about any other European country, there is heavy pressure on us to support the Bill on the two main bases of the harm principle and equalisation of free time between countries.

Finally, I would like to reinforce the point that it is not possible to have it both ways. It is all very well for the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) to announce with satisfaction that he tries to have it both ways—sometimes succeeding, sometimes failing—but that is somewhat disrespectful to the general public, who do not regard these questions as a game. It is not reasonable to assume that postponing or preventing the Bill's passage is anything other than a personal—and, I have to say, somewhat egotistical—victory. It is an important Bill and should be treated as such.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst knows that I often agree with him on matters associated with freedom, not to mention on the new hours of the House. He should therefore reflect seriously on the fact that someone who is predisposed to share the same libertarian values as him has a totally different view on this Bill. I counsel him to think with some humility about his motives in trying to postpone the Bill. I hope that he will think again.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): I declare an interest from the outset, as I am a member of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. My details are in the register, and I am also the chairman of the USDAW branch in Parliament. I want to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on persisting with this fairly long-running debate, which has been knocked back—perhaps by nothing more than coincidence—in previous years. I also congratulate the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) on his excellent contribution to the debate.

I shall be brief because my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham has already covered the main points. We must remember that we are talking about many thousands of shop workers who are already under a great deal of pressure. They are not well paid and they are often regarded by the public—including themselves, I suppose, when they are shopping—as part of the furniture in stores. USDAW has had an extremely successful campaign over the last 12 months in drawing attention to the large amount of aggression and abuse that is directed at shop workers. The union has uncovered a hidden problem, and it is trying to highlight in the public mind the fact that shop workers are people with human rights.

The Bill is about one single day in the year. It is designed to nip in the bud the practice of large retail outlets opening on Christmas day. For all the reasons that have been mentioned, we need to stop that now. It is not only workers in the large stores who are affected; the people who have to supply the large stores, who have to carry out waste disposal, who have to manage the traffic and so forth are all affected by the opening of large stores on Christmas day.

Competition is also relevant. The irony is that virtually all the stores that USDAW consulted said that they did not want to open, but if one of them opens, the competition and margins are so tight that all the competitors will want to open up, too. As the hon. Member for South Staffordshire explained, the problem will escalate. The stores are saying to us, "We do not want to open, so will you please legislate to stop us doing so?" That is ironic, but that is the position.

It is no use saying that the matter can be left to volunteering—that the workers in the stores can say yes or no. We all know what volunteering means in this place when there is a one-line Whip: we are free to attend or not, but as every Member who has ever run into a Whip knows, it is not as easy as that. Large stores cannot be staffed with many hundreds of volunteer employees: it is an impossibility. As the hon. Member for South Staffordshire described perfectly, the reality of volunteering is heavy pressure on each shift in the light of how much business has been generated at the end of the month or year.

People outside the House would be truly astonished if this modest and moderate measure were objected to. The Bill is simple, just and proper, and I believe that about 99 per cent. of the population would be astonished to find any opposition to it.

Mr. Forth rose—

Mr. Pickthall: I am about to finish.

[Mr. Pickthall]

I urge support for the Bill, whose passage will be met with acclaim by everyone outside Parliament.

10.16 am

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I greatly support the Bill, conscious of the fact that, unlike my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), I gave full support to the Conservative Government's Shops Bill 1986, which was intended to allow shops and other businesses to open on a Sunday. The House will recall that that Bill did not succeed. It was the largest revolt by Government Back Benchers ever, until the Higher Education Bill this year—and, perhaps, until next week! Opposition to the Shops Bill was encouraged by an unholy alliance between the Churches and the trade unions, which both wanted the law to restrict what people could do on Sundays. I supported the Shops Bill because it included protection for those who did not want to work on a Sunday.

The Bill before us today confirms the protection that this country has always given to the special place of Christmas day in our society. Such protection is much the same as that which every Christian country gives to Christmas day. Many more Christians go to church for mass or a service on Christmas day than attend church regularly on Sundays. As the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) said, Christmas is the one day of the year when most families come together and when good people go out of their way to find and provide for those with no families. There is therefore no case for our high streets to be busy on Christmas day. That is the purpose of the Bill, and I believe that few people in this country would wish other than for it to be passed.

I felt one hesitation when the hon. Member for North Durham announced his Bill, following his good fortune in the ballot. It arose from my own experience in my first job, which was working in a family business in the motor trade. It had two petrol filling stations and was a small business with an enviable reputation for fair dealing and service to customers. To provide such service, we opened to supply petrol every Christmas day. I well recall opening Chalkwell motor company in London road, Westcliff-on-Sea, Essex at 9 o'clock on Christmas day for several years, closing at 1 o'clock to speed home for Christmas lunch. We provided a service that was appreciated by our regular customers and by many others who found that most filling stations were closed on Christmas day. I am encouraged by the fact that the Bill excludes petrol stations, as well as small convenience stores.

I congratulate the hon. Member for North Durham on introducing the Bill, and I congratulate USDAW on its campaign in support of the Bill. Half the union's members appear to be in the House today. I hope that the Bill succeeds.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): I shall be brief, because I want to see the Bill go through as quickly as possible. However, I wish to give a little support to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). He is old enough, and certainly ugly enough, to look after himself, but to attack him for seeking to wreck the parliamentary process is undeserved. He is probably one of the greatest proponents and defenders of parliamentary democracy on either side of the House, and always has been. He and I disagree honourably on occasions, as on this, but I defend his right to use such parliamentary measures as he sees fit to promote what he believes in, as I now propose to promote what I believe in.

In that context, I hope that my right hon. Friend will retain his seat for the rest of the morning and not see fit to intervene on this occasion. I am one of those who proudly and—I hope—honourably voted against the Shops Bill in 1986. It was not so bad. My toenails grew again, after the Whips' attentions. I was equally proud to have my name on the list in the handbag for several years afterwards.

When the Sunday Trading Act 1994 went through, it was on the clear understanding that as there was an established Church in this country, we had two specific, very holy days in the calendar. One was Easter Sunday, which is protected because it always falls on a Sunday, and the other was Christmas day. It was wrongly and—it transpires—naively assumed that Christmas day would also be protected. Setting aside all the other arguments that have been made this morning, all the Bill seeks to do is to correct an error in that Act.

My right hon. Friend is acutely aware of the fact that those hon. Friends of ours who helped the 1994 Act go through—I must say that I voted against it—did so on the clear understanding that Easter Sunday and Christmas day would be protected. This morning's debate is about the restoration of that tiny piece of democracy, to put right what is now perceived to have been a wrong and to reinforce the will of the House at that time. I hope that my right hon. Friend will understand that and give the Bill the fair wind that it deserves.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I do not wish to get involved in arguments that our party may have had in the past—which are still obviously very much alive—so perhaps I could find a third way: I wish to take issue with the definition of a large shop. I congratulate the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on coming so high in the ballot and bringing this Bill before the House. It is a great opportunity.

However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will consider the case of Stan's Shop in my constituency. It was started by a gentleman called Stan Faulks, with his demob money, shortly after the war. At the time, it was a little shop. It has been a tradition that the shop opens for a couple of hours on Christmas morning, originally to provide batteries for disappointed children whose parents had forgotten to buy them when they bought electronic toys as presents. It was a community service and there was no pressure on staff. I endorse everything that has been said about preserving the nature of Christmas and would not want to see any compulsion on people to work.

The problem is that Stan's Shop is no longer a little shop: it is a large shop. It now covers an area of 22,500 sq ft, having been developed by Stan's son and grandson. The family work in it and it is—in terms of the Bill—a large shop, but it has all the attributes of a little shop. It provides a wonderful local service and it is very popular. It also maintains the tradition of opening for two hours, from 10 to 12, on Christmas morning. Does that really impinge on the nature of Christmas in my area? It is a strong farming community, where the cows have to be milked on Christmas morning and evening. Stan's Shop is a family enterprise. Half a dozen girls and boys come in to help in the shop and, although I have not been there on Christmas day, I understand that there is a festive atmosphere. As I said, it also provides a useful service. For instance, last Christmas, a lady in Shrewsbury found when she defrosted her turkey that it had gone off. Her Christmas would have been spoilt, but she drove up from Shrewsbury and Stan's Shop provided—as always—what she needed.

I entirely endorse the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack); I do not want to see Christmas being spoiled. I also agree with him about the nature of Sunday having changed in London. However, I hope that we can look at the Bill a little more carefully with regard to splendid institutions such as Stan's. It is a small family organisation that provides a valuable local service, but it would be swept up in the Bill as if it were a monster multiple. I hope that the hon. Member for North Durham will reflect on that point and be willing to tighten up the definition of a large shop.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I oppose the Bill and I shall explain why. I hope that those Members who do not often grace us with their presence on a Friday will understand that taking a position on a Bill is part of the parliamentary process and that Members are always free to turn up on Fridays and express their views one way or another on private Members' Bills. I am slightly surprised—although not shocked—that my attendance every Friday the House sits to express my views on private Members' Bills should attract such opprobrium. I thought that that was what we were here for, but perhaps I am a little old-fashioned and things have moved on.

I wish to discuss the Bill under several headings. I shall not speak at excessive length, because that would be of little relevance on this occasion, given the time of day, although it has extreme relevance on other occasions. I have a good feel for the way in which such days work. I will, if I can persuade any of my colleagues to assist me, seek to divide the House at the end of the debate, because I wish to discover how many Members of Parliament, of the 659 of us, have taken the trouble to be here today to support the Bill. It is always important to demonstrate that and I am sure that Labour Members will also wish to do so. Those who have taken the trouble to be here would surely like that to be a matter of record, and I am sure that the public would wish to know just how much support there is for the Bill. It has been claimed repeatedly in this short debate that there is enormous support for the Bill, but I am in favour of quantifying that support, and the only way to do so is to divide the House.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Before my right hon. Friend takes too much criticism for the time that he takes to discuss these matters, will he reflect on the fact that one of the longest speeches we have had in recent times on a private Member's Bill was made by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), when he attempted to stop a Bill making progress? My right hon. Friend does not hold the record: it is held by a Labour Back Bencher, who may have been acting on orders.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because I am a fan of the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore). He is my role model and I sometimes wish that I could do half as well as he does. [Interruption.] Here he is, to enjoy my praise. It is no good Members turning up once in a blue moon to support a Bill that they happen to favour and to criticise regular attenders, like the hon. Gentleman and myself. It will not do. For that reason, all the personal criticisms that are aimed at me from time to time bounce right off. Being here every Friday inures one to such comments.

I shall press on with my attempt to analyse the Bill and its background. I have a few introductory remarks, then I shall address the Bill itself, and I shall then indicate appropriate amendments for subsequent stages of the Bill, which I hope will be helpful to colleagues. I shall start head on with the proposition about choice and freedom. Of course, it is important that we consider how to balance individual personal freedoms in a mature society—even, dare I say it, in a mature consumer society. I use that term—I hope that it will appeal to Labour Members—because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made little secret of the fact that it is the consumers in our society who have provided the economic growth that has contributed to the fall in unemployment of which the Government are so proud. Let us not decry the role of the consumer in our society.

There is a danger in debates such as this that people start to talk about consumers as though they were pariahs, but in our modern society—where, sadly, manufacturing sector employment has shrunk to less than 20 per cent.—employment has been generated in the retail and service sectors. Any attempt that we make to restrict the activity of those sectors, on this day or that, or for this reason or that, must be weighed very carefully indeed. That consideration has been missing so far in the debate. Let us bear in mind that we live in a consumer society and that the consumption of goods and services and the retail and hospitality sectors are extremely important components of our economy; we interfere with them at our risk.

That is a general background for the preference I always maintain and for which I have already been criticised this morning, although I make no complaint about such criticisms: I always try to come down on the side of choice, freedom and individual action, as against the arbitrary use of the law to interfere in that freedom—the Bill is an example. That is my starting position and it tends to inform my attitude to legislation such as this.

Let us look for a moment at multiculturalism, something that rather fascinates me. I am not by instinct a multiculturalist; I do not think that any of my friends will ever have heard me refer to the concept—except, perhaps, in critical terms. I believe in monoculturalism, and I wish that those who choose to join our society would freely accept its mores and traditions, because that is the way a sound society is built. The melting-pot concept, which built that great country the United States, was based on that very principle and premise. I welcome that. None the less, there is a problem in relation to the Bill. Members and other people outside this place who praise the concept of multiculturalism and constantly urge on us the fact that we must respect other religions, views and beliefs, are in difficulty when it comes to provisions of the kind that we are talking about.

I should have thought that we wanted to respect those elements in our society that are not Christian. I took the trouble to look up the 2001 census to try to put some numbers on that. Among people of working age—the 16 to 74 age group—the Christian element is 72 per cent., but the number of people with no religion, or no stated religion, was 22 per cent. The figure for the other defined religions was 4.1 per cent., and I shall run through them in order. Because we are talking about Christmas day, it is relevant for us to understand how many people in our society are not Christians and for whom that day might not be of the same relevance as it us to others. The number of Muslims was 2.6 per cent; Hindus, 1 per cent; Sikhs, 0.6 per cent; Jews, 0.4 per cent; other, 0.3 per cent; and Buddhists, 0.2 per cent.

I mention those figures because we must not make the glib assumption that our law has to be directed in such a way as simply to satisfy the Christian element in our society. If we are serious about multiculturalism, and about acknowledging the beliefs and the freedom to act of those who follow other religions, we must take that into account.

Incidentally, in case anyone is curious, the census figures for the religion of the wholesale and retail element in the working population are broadly the same as those I gave earlier. Christians are 72 per cent; no religion, or no stated religion, 23.5 per cent.; while the other religions that I listed comprise 6.5 per cent. If we are to follow our words with action, we must be careful not to legislate so that we prohibit the activities or behaviour of those who are not of the Christian religion. We have to meet that challenge head-on when contemplating legislation of this kind.

Furthermore, we must not forget that many members of other religions own or operate retail outlets. At present, they are free, and should be free, to close their stores on the days that they regard as important and holy, and to open them on other days. That is important. In the Sunday Trading Act 1994, to which the Bill refers, the Jewish religion is, properly, singled out for recognition, and—as a passing thought—if we update the law on these matters we should revisit those provisions and consider whether we should identify other significant religions in our society in the same way as, at that stage, we singled out the Jewish religion. I leave that thought in the air, because that is an anomaly.

We have heard talk of anomalies. My hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) pointed out that the Bill deals with an oversight in the previous legislation, although, given the parliamentary focus on Sunday trading legislation in the 1980s and again in the 1990s, I find it slightly difficult to understand how such an oversight was possible. Amendments could and should have been made to deal with it. It is interesting that we are revisiting the matter in 2004 when so much time has passed, but we must deal with the Bill as it is and not as it might have been—although I shall come on to the might have beens as I develop my argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) noted an interesting aspect: the anomalies that are inevitably created as soon as one makes distinctions in legislation between this or that category of item—between larger or smaller stores, in this case. I am surprised, and almost disappointed, that the anomaly created by the 1994 Act is being repeated in the Bill, because apparently the Bill wants to provide a degree of protection to those who are privileged enough to work in large stores while ignoring those who work in smaller stores. That is in itself discriminatory, which I find disappointing.

A trade union point is relevant in this context. Employees of large stores are more likely to be trade union members and to enjoy trade union protection than those in small stores but, ironically, the Bill seeks, in effect, to give greater protection to people who are probably already protected by their union, and by the law, whereas those who have the misfortune—in these circumstances—to work for small stores appear to be completely unprotected. That is an anomaly and, in a sense, discrimination, and I am surprised that the House and the Bill's supporters apparently want it to be continued. When will we have a level playing field?

I should have been much more sympathetic to the Bill if it had included a provision that offered the schedule 4 protection for Christmas day provided in the 1994 Act. That is a weakness that I do not understand, so perhaps when the sponsor of the Bill replies to the debate he will explain why he has not included schedule 4 protection.

On the subject of anomalies, there is another point that has not yet been mentioned. We should not assume that Christmas day is an oasis of peace for every member of our society. Health workers, the police, the people who provide our transport and utilities and large parts of the hospitality sector are all expected to work on our behalf, providing us with support and services, on Christmas day—to say nothing of the list of exemptions to be carried forward from the 1994 Act, about which I shall speak in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) told us an emotional story about the provision that he and his family were prepared to offer the public at large on Christmas day. I welcome that and congratulate him. That story shows that there is a demand for services on Christmas day. We do not all necessarily sit in our homes, go nowhere and use no services of any kind. When we pick up the telephone on Christmas day, we expect it to work. Indeed, a large proportion of all long-distance calls are made on Christmas day. That is yet another example involving people who would not be protected by the Bill, because we simply assume that they will be working.

We are singling out a specific section of the work force for protection under the Bill, while—apparently—glibly assuming that all those other people will be available to provide the services that we expect on Christmas day.

Mr. Paterson: May I reiterate a point that I made earlier? There is a case for carefully considering the definition of such premises in rural areas. As I pointed out in an example from my constituency, a small enterprise can become a big one, and large areas of countryside with nothing else often surround such premises. They provide a valuable service, without impinging on the nature of Christmas. In a rural area, a small enterprise can become a big one and still provide the same valuable family services as before.

Mr. Forth: That may well provide the opportunity for my hon. Friend to seek to amend the Bill, either in Committee or, as I would expect, on Report. His intervention rather neatly leads me into mentioning the exemptions in schedule 1 to the 1994 Act that are carried forward into the Bill, apparently uncritically and on the basis of acceptance. I wonder whether he has looked at that list of exemptions because it has a bearing on his intervention. The lists starts with "any shop which is at a farm and where the trade or business carried on consists wholly or mainly of the sale of produce from that farm".

That is a nod in the direction of the rural dimension that he mentions. It presumably does not cover the case that he mentions, which is why an amendment may be relevant. Let us remember that such stores can open on Sundays and that that provision would be carried forward into the Bill, as I understand it.

Then, intriguingly, the list of exemptions continues:

"any shop where the trade or business carried on consists wholly or mainly of the sale of intoxicating liquor".

That is an interesting exemption if ever I saw one. We are starting into that list of activities—either on the part of the shopper or the provider of the service—that we think are acceptable on Christmas day, as opposed to the other activities.

The schedule then goes on to list

"motor supplies . . . cycle supplies . . . pharmacy . . . medicinal products . . . surgical appliances . . . railway station . . . petrol filling station"— to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East referred—and related to a filling station and food stores for vessels or aircraft. So we have a large list of exemptions. Let us not therefore imagine that the protection originally provided by the 1994 Act—I am told that the Bill seeks to close a loophole in it—was all-encompassing. In fact, a large number of exemptions exist, covering both the size of stores and, in that explicit list in schedule 1, the type of stores.

"any shop at a service area"

Let us put aside all the tear-jerking and emotional appeals that we have heard in this morning's brief debate. What we are really saying is that we want to single out a group of people in the retail sector who we believe deserve special treatment—those working for large stores—but there is a probably an even larger group who will not receive that protection. Why? On the one hand, they happen to work in a small store, while on the other, they happen to sell booze. That strikes me as an interesting, perhaps even a rather odd, approach. Why so many people want to argue that such protection is so effective is somewhat beyond me. I do not think that it is effective.

USDAW, which is the union that has driven the whole thing, has targeted a modest campaign at me in my constituency. I have no complaint about that. We are all used to bizarre little interest groups targeting us from time to time, and another one has popped up. It is pity that the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) is not still in the Chamber. He proudly claimed to be the chairman of USDAW in the House, so I thought that I would tell him the figures to show how effective his union is in targeting me in my constituency.

I checked my post this morning and my telephone. I shall give the figures for the amount of interest in the Bill among USDAW members in Bromley and Chislehurst: phone calls, five, one of which was extremely abusive, but I do not mind that as I am used to it even in the House; pre-printed rather glossy postcards, 17; and pro-forma letters, 16. So of the 70,000 voters in Bromley and Chislehurst, most of whom are proud shoppers and consumers—I am happy to say that we have one of the best shopping malls in the country at Bromley, and I am even happier that it is open on Sundays—and of the massed ranks of USDAW, pumped up by their union and invited to contact me for my wicked activities in the House today, the grand total so far is 37 people. I hope that that message will be passed on to the hon. Member for West Lancashire. He wants to gee up his people a bit if he wants to try that sort of thing.

We now come to inspectors. This is another interesting one because we will create a small category of people who must work on Christmas day, as a result of the Bill. Inspectors have not been mentioned much so far. They are an honourable group of people. Until now, probably except for one Christmas day in seven, which happens to fall on a Sunday, they have Christmas day off, but not any more. Funnily enough, I have not received any representation from local authority trading standards inspectors so far. They are obviously a pretty compliant bunch—or perhaps they want the overtime, who knows? I have no idea, but they will have to be out there, pounding the streets, ensuring that no store of over 3,000 sq ft opens on Christmas day, as a result of the Bill. By the way, that must inevitably involve an extra cost. It will not be very substantial, but it will be incurred.

I always try to be fair to the explanatory notes. I always like to put in this point in passing at some point during such debates. The explanatory notes state that they "have been prepared by the Department of Trade and Industry with the consent of" the promoter of the Bill. I am always a bit suspicious about such things. It is interesting how some private Members' Bills receive no help from Departments, yet others do. Perhaps the Minister will explain why the Government were neutral when such a Bill was last considered in the House and failed because only 37 Members bothered to vote for it. That is something obviously burned on the conscience of Labour Members as they have been dragooned in today to ensure that that does not happen again. I hope that we get the numbers if we have a Division. I would be fascinated to know the provenance of the explanatory notes.

The explanatory notes state:

"In view of the current practice and plans of large retailers"— an interesting comment, given what follows—

"the effect of the Bill on local government staff numbers (in relation to enforcement) is expected to be negligible."

[Mr. Forth]

So the explanatory notes predict that there will be very little activity on that front, but they confess that there will be an effect on local government staff numbers—the poor inspectors—and a cost because they must be paid either overtime or, if they are salaried, for an element of additional expenses.

While I am on the subject, the very next paragraph says:

"the vast majority of large retailers do not currently open Christmas Day and have no immediate plans to do so."

What about all the scare stories that we have just heard from Labour Members? The explanatory notes themselves—the Department, the Minister—tell us that

"the vast majority of large retailers do not currently open Christmas Day and have no immediate plans to do so."

That is somewhat at odds with the scare stories that Labour Members have tried to peddle, so we need a bit of clarification about that when the Minister catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That small but significant category of people would be disadvantaged if the Bill were to reach the statute book. They would have to work on Christmas day, as opposed to the other people who would not have to do so.

Lembit Öpik: I do not want to detain the right hon. Gentleman. He said at the start that he was informed by libertarian principles. He has made no comparison of the harm principle in respect of the relative benefits to those who would not be made to work versus the small number, as he says in the quotation that he cites, who would be. Will he spend a moment or two explaining his view of the Bill's libertarian consequences and why he is against it for libertarian reasons?

Sir Patrick Cormack: No, we have had enough.

Mr. Forth: If the hon. Gentleman wants me to expand—

Sir Patrick Cormack: No.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman is getting my hon. Friend over-excited already, and that is just by an intervention. I am now caught between two colleagues. The hon. Gentleman, who urges me to expand on some of my remarks, and my hon. Friend, who will become over-excited if I am tempted to do so. Subject to guidance from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—which I do not seek, I hasten to add—I find myself in a bit of a quandary.

In friendship to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), I point out that I said briefly at the beginning of my remarks that there is always a tension between the entirely liberal approach that his party, sadly, rarely follows these days and the costs. My preference is always to leave the maximum freedom to, in this case, the shop owner, the shop proprietor, the shop worker and, most important of all, the consumer. They are by far the largest majority in society. That is my view on the balance of things.

The hon. Gentleman has led me easily into the next part of my brief analysis—the applicability or not to this Bill of schedule 4 of the 1994 Act. I remain puzzled because of what was said by one of the USDAW members, who telephoned me at the instigation of her union and with whom I discussed the matter. When I asked her, "What about your union? What are they doing for you?", she replied, "Oh, they're useless—absolutely nothing." I asked, "What about your shop steward in your store?", and she said, "He's just left and gone off to another job." That is in an interesting comment. In this era of full employment, people have many more options as to where they choose to work than they might have in other circumstances.

I believe that the role of the trade union is worthy of exploration. It seems to me that it wants to use the law to do what it should be doing already. The hon. Member for West Lancashire is back in his place, but he did not feel that he had time to give way to me earlier. If he is going to tell me that the provisions of schedule 4 of the 1994 Act are inadequate or inoperable or that his union cannot make them work effectively, that should be the target for the amendment to legislation. We should not have this heavy-handed Bill that is trying to stop people doing what they might reasonably want to do on Christmas day. We should ask what protection is provided by a combination of the existing law—the 1994 Act—and the trade union. If the trade union is falling down on the job as badly as its member, who was instigated to call me, said—I am glad that she did—the union should look seriously at itself, what it does, how it does it and why it does not protect its members adequately.

The provisions of schedule 4 of the 1994 Act are lengthy, detailed and comprehensive, but I will not attempt go through them in detail. That is for another day and a subsequent stage of the Bill when we will want to get into the nitty-gritty, but the question is hovering unseen in the background to the debate. What has the union been up to? Has it been serving its members effectively? Why is it spending a lot of time sending out glossy postcards to its members asking them to send them to their Members of Parliament instead of doing the job that it should be doing, which is to make itself available to its members, perhaps to recruit more members and to make sure that the proper protections that were provided in schedule 4 of the 1994 Act are made available to shop workers and to retail workers? That question has to be answered.

Having trotted through the preliminaries, I shall take a brief look through the Bill. I do that to provide an introduction to its subsequent stages. It will be considered in Committee and come back, very importantly, for Report and Third Reading. Much useful work will be done then.

Clause 1(1) states:

"A large shop"—

this returns us to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire—

"must not be open on Christmas Day for the serving of retail customers."

My wife and I are avid shoppers at a store called Costco, which I thoroughly recommend to the House. The nearest one to us is in the Lakeside complex in Essex, just across the Thames from us in Kent. It is a large wholesale store and the public cannot just wander in; one has to be a member to have the privilege of shopping there. It is a wonderful store with very keen prices and a wonderful range of goods. It is packed on Sundays. Presumably it would not be covered by the provisions in clause 1(1), which talks about the serving of retail customers. Therefore, if I can persuade Costco to open on Christmas day, I would be able to go and shop there. I might well be tempted to do so. Mrs. Forth and I are avid retail and, in this case, wholesale shoppers and we would find that a very attractive possibility.

That is another anomaly that has opened up to add to all the other anomalies that are beginning to become apparent in the Bill. They include discrimination against employees in small stores, discrimination against people of religions other than Christianity, and all the others that I have mentioned. Here is another one right at the start of the Bill. One does not need to go any further.

Perhaps the Bill's promoter or the Minister—he has had such an input to the process—can explain why there has been no need to revisit the exemptions in schedule 1 of the 1994 Act that are carried forward into this Bill. I would be fascinated if either of them could tell me that they are completely satisfied with that list of exemptions in every respect or that there might be scope—there may well be—for adding, reviewing or reducing the list. I think that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will agree that it is a rare piece of legislation that arises from a 1994 Act that we, as this great body gathered together, can see no reason to update or amend. I refer to the provisions for liquor stores, petrol stations, pharmacies and all the other exemptions mentioned in the list. Is this list so good and was our perspicacity so great in 1994 that, 10 years on, we see no need to revisit the matter? That is an interesting question.

Funnily enough, the adequacy of the level of the fine in the Bill was mentioned in our previous canter round this course three or four years ago when the previous attempt at a Bill failed miserably through lack of support by Members of Parliament. There is a real question as to whether the fine would be an effective deterrent to a large store that decided to open in defiance of the provisions and take the hit, if I can put it that way, of the fine. I have no way of measuring the effect of the fine, but its appropriateness is a relevant consideration.

While we are talking about the fine, one always has to ask whether it is wise to include a precise amount in the Bill. As we learn at our grandmother's knee when we arrive in this place, whatever we put in a Bill that will become an Act—I hope that it will not in this case—is difficult to change. However, the Bill's promoter has decided to include a figure in the Bill. He had better hope that inflation remains as low as it has been. If we get a burst of inflation, the real value of the fine specified in the Bill will be whittled down pretty quickly. Then there would be some regret. Should a figure for the fine be specified in the Bill?

I mentioned, in passing, the duty to enforce and the duties of the inspectors. This unfortunate group of people will now have to work on Christmas day, as opposed to all the others for whom the aim is that they should not have to work. We should give the inspectors a passing thought and, in doing so, ask whether the enforcement provisions, which are largely carried forward from the 1994 Act and which include the powers of entry—a matter that always makes me uneasy—are exactly what we want them to be. Should those provisions be revisited?

Schedule 2 to the 1994 Act refers both to general enforcement provisions in part 1—the inspectors, powers of entry and so on—and to shops occupied by persons observing the Jewish Sabbath and shops occupied by persons of the Jewish religion in part 2. It is at least worth considering whether we should extend that provision given the changing nature of our society. I gave the figures and analysis of the different religious groups not only in our society as a whole, but in the wholesale and retail sector as well. It strikes me that it is worth giving some thought as to whether faiths other than the Christian faith could be mentioned either explicitly or in a more general, all-embracing provision. I accept that there would be definitional problems with that and it would have to be considered in more detail. I simply flag it up as something that needs proper consideration because it picks out a particular group.

I think I am right in saying that, interestingly, the members of the Jewish faith in particular who work in the retail sector are actually, according to the census—this may surprise some hon. Members—smaller in number than the members of all the other faiths, other than Christianity, that are listed. That raises the question of why it is that members of the Jewish faith are picked out when greater numbers of other faiths may not wish to acknowledge the sanctity of Christmas day in the way that most Christians would. The relevance of the Bill to them has to be considered.

All in all, I have cantered briefly around the course and have no reason to detain the House unduly. [Interruption.] I see that I am disappointing the hon. Member for Hendon. He knows that there are horses for courses, and times for this and times for that—something that he explained to me recently about a Bill of his own, to which we shall return on another Friday. I recognise the dynamics of each Friday, and of this one in particular, so I am happy to have set out my severe reservations, for all sorts of philosophical and practical reasons.

I will send this little speech of mine to all the USDAW members who were kind enough to contact me by their pre-printed postcards and pro-forma letters. Indeed, if any USDAW officials who were kind enough to waste their union's money on that exercise would like a copy of my speech, I shall be only too happy to send it to them, such is my generosity.

I hope that I have given some flavour of my reservations. I look forward very much to returning to them in the Bill's subsequent stages, which I think will, if anything, be even more interesting.

11.3 am

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): It gives me great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who, like me, regularly attends Friday morning debates. We have some of the most interesting, colourful and best debates on such occasions because they are traditionally unwhipped. He is a master of Friday mornings and knows the procedures of the House better than most, if not any. It was interesting to note the way in which he decided to terminate his remarks. Many hon. Members will be grateful that he does not want to filibuster and to talk the Bill out. He realises that that would be otiose and not in keeping with the will and mood of the Chamber.

[Mr. Barry Gardiner]

I, too, do not wish to detain the House for long. I wish the Bill the speediest of passages, both today and in future. However, many comments by hon. Members on both sides of the House related to the specifically Christian nature of the celebration of the high holy day of Christmas. I speak not simply as a practising Christian, but as a representative of the most ethnically diverse and multicultural borough in Britain and, indeed, Europe. Brent has more than 120 different first languages spoken in its schools. We have every faith that it is possible to conceive of in our borough. Yet not one person has opposed the Bill on the ground of respect for different cultures and faiths.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that many other faiths support the Bill because they also want Christmas day preserved as a family holiday? In addition, they do not want the taxpayer to incur the extra cost that would arise from large stores opening on Christmas day, which would require normal council services, such as waste disposal and street cleaning, to be in place.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend makes an important point. She encapsulates the one thing that I wanted to talk about: respect for the family, which underpins all the different religious traditions and communities that are represented in my borough. It is because of that respect for the family—because people realise that there should be, in any culture, one day on which the family is paramount—that people of different faiths have chosen to support the Bill, and I am delighted that they have done so.

It is clear from the nature of large work forces that the idea that shop workers can simply decide whether they want to work on Christmas day—that they can volunteer—is ridiculous. We all know the pressures that exist in any workplace. People who do not volunteer are marked down for the future and their managers look at them less favourably when it comes to promotions. It may well be that my own lack of volunteering is responsible for me languishing on the Back Benches week after week.

I hope that hon. Members who want to divide the House and who will go into the Lobby against the Bill will consider, when they think of the freedoms that they believe themselves to be fighting for, the way in which those shop workers are being denied their freedoms.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on what I said about the effectiveness of the protections that are given in schedule 4 to the 1994 Act, and the role of the trade union? Is he completely happy that the trade union that is behind the Bill has done everything in its power to make the provisions effective? If not, what is the solution?

Mr. Gardiner: I have a different view of the role of trade unions in this country from that of the right hon. Gentleman. He always sees trade unions as an oppressive force in society.

Mr. Forth indicated assent.

Mr. Gardiner: The right hon. Gentleman acknowledges that he does so, but I see trade unions as the organisations that have fought for workers' rights for more than a century and achieved many progressive measures to emancipate the work force. It is essential to understand that trade unions, and particularly USDAW, seek to protect the situation of their members. They do not want workers in large stores and shops coerced, albeit by managers who say, "Of course you have a choice," in the full and certain knowledge that if they exercise that choice in one direction they will ultimately be penalised and have it marked on their cards against them. If the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to accept that, I am sorry but we must disagree.

Many Labour Members have experience, to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, as members of USDAW or other unions or from a retailing background. They have seen such pressures being applied. They know that that is the way that things operate. Earlier in our debate, one of my hon. Friends commented on how this House operates—we all know the pressures that a one or two-line Whip can impose to make sure that Members are here. Even if a three-line Whip does not apply, there are always pressures on people to vote, and that happens with retail management too.

To return to my central point, all communities recognise the importance of family and of having one day on which people take care of each other, come together, and are not subject to the commercial pressures that we see throughout society during the rest of the year: one day on which family is sacred. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) spoke of his experience of opening a petrol station for just a couple of hours on Christmas morning. The service that he provided enabled families to come together. On Christmas day, families need to travel to see distant relatives or to come to the main family house for Christmas lunch, so that the whole family can be united on that day. That is why I agree wholeheartedly with him that that is an honourable and welcome exception to the Bill, which should not restrict petrol stations that provide that service. It goes to the heart of what the Bill is about: the nature of family and bringing families together on one day a year without commercial pressures.

It is wrong that people should be discouraged, that there should be alternative attractions to go out and engage in commercial activity on Christmas day and that large stores should be open, vying for custom. That is not why I support the Bill, however. I recognise what the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst says: if people want to go out and engage in commercial activity when it is available, that is a decision for them. But the point is that the work force are being coerced on those days when they find it difficult if not impossible to refuse. It is their families whom I seek to protect, and whom my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) seeks to protect through his Bill.

Many stores have said that they have no desire to open and compete on Christmas day, but if one of them does, the others will feel obliged to do so to protect their position because commercial margins are so tight. They want us to legislate, to step in and say, "No. We will protect this time, which is for family." My hon. Friend has done the House a great service by promoting this Bill.

The Ministers on the Front Bench are raring to wind up this debate, and I have no intention or desire to prolong it. The House should have the opportunity to vote on this important matter, and I am confident that my hon. Friend's Bill will be passed.

11.15 am

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I want to speak briefly on this Bill. I will not speak for as long as the hon. Gentleman who spoke previously.

I welcome the Bill. Should there be a Division, I will support it. But I would also like one change to be made in Committee. A great number of people work on Christmas day in the catering trade, and in the forces, where cover must be provided. For the catering trade, I would like an amendment to protect those who work on Christmas day. At the moment, there is a national minimum wage, but it does not reflect statutory holidays or working on statutory holidays. I believe that Christmas day is particularly important, and there is a case for reflecting that in the Bill for people who work in the catering trade on that day. The matter should be discussed in Committee. I will not delay the Bill further, having made those small points.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): I, too, shall be brief in my words of support for the Bill.

This is in essence a simple measure that deals with the anomaly of the Sunday Trading Act 1994 that prevents stores from opening on Christmas day unless it falls on a Sunday. I cannot understand how anybody can vote against a measure that puts right that anomaly, and neither will the millions of shop workers, who are largely women workers who already have a great deal of pressure on them at Christmas because they are responsible for organising Christmas day and bringing the family together. I therefore support the Bill totally.

Christmas is already the busiest time of year for shop workers, and most of them are not allowed to take annual leave in the final weeks of December because the stores are so busy. They must have Christmas day protected for that reason, too. I was imagining earlier what would happen if stores opened on Christmas day. I envisaged a scenario in which families would open their gifts in the morning, have their lunch and all be down the shops in the afternoon returning the Christmas presents they did not want. That would destroy the whole essence of Christmas day and family life, so I hope that this Bill speedily passes into law.

11.18 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). As a fellow promoter of a private Member's Bill, let me say that he and I know how much skill it takes to succeed in the ballot.

This is a good Bill, and I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on it. I make it clear from the outset, that since the events of 18 years ago, this has been a conscience issue in my party, so I speak purely in a personal capacity. We have had a good debate and interesting contributions from both sides. I did not agree with the bulk of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), but he brought to the House the erudition, knowledge and experience that he brings to all his speeches. This House is the better for having a strong defender of Parliament speaking out as he does five days a week, unlike the vast majority of us, who are only here on four days or even fewer.

My right hon. Friend was right about one point, which was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). This is a good time for us to remember those people who necessarily have to work on Sundays. As the son of a soldier, and with many relatives in the medical profession, I am very conscious of that as we discuss this matter.

I warmly welcome the Bill. It is intended to protect not only retail workers, but, more importantly, their families and those who live around major retail outlets. I supported the restrictions on Sunday trading and thought that the Sunday Trading Act 1994 was good because the old arrangements were being so widely breached. At least we now have some proper regulation to ensure that shops do not open early on a Sunday morning, which in practice many large shops were doing under the old arrangements. I should have liked greater regulation in that respect.

I make no bones about being pleased that the Bill publicly recognises the fact that we are still a predominantly Christian country, and I feel in no way embarrassed about that. Christmas is a very special day for families across the country—a day on which as many people as possible should have the opportunity to spend time with husbands, wives and children. We already have fewer public holidays than most other EU countries—eight, as opposed to 12 in Portugal and Austria, 14 in France and Belgium, and 15 in Germany.

The Department of Trade and Industry's work-life balance campaign recently found that nearly two fifths of adults in the crucial age group of 35 to 55—the majority of parents—feel that they spend too much time at work. Those people include the majority of parents. The DTI's second work-life balance study found that almost 38 per cent. of all employees work in occupations that from time to time involve working on Sundays. In the retail sector, the figure is well over that. It is staggering to think that, according to a survey by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, a higher proportion of people in this country than in any other feel that they have to work for longer than they wish for economic reasons. That has much to do with issues that go way beyond the scope of this Bill, such as overcrowding and the cost of housing. I do not think that it is a coincidence that our divorce rate is one of the highest in Europe—more than 50 per cent. higher than the average. The Bill seeks, in a modest way, to ease one strain on family life.

As the 24-hour society comes inexorably closer, partly encouraged by the instant nature of the internet, on which one can do or purchase almost anything 24 hours a day, it is inevitable that even Christmas day will come to be regarded by some as no different from any other day. I do not believe that, which is why I am glad to support the Bill. Shopping has become almost the new religion, and in the process we forget the retail worker. Almost any occupation that one cares to name will, rightly, have its stout public defenders: nurses, doctors, teachers, farmers, alternative medicine practitioners, fisherman, police officers; the list goes on and on. There are always strong voices for those people in this House, but retail workers do not have a particularly loud voice, despite the large number of USDAW members. Yet roughly 10 per cent. of the work force works in the retail trade, the majority of whom are women. Many of those who already work on Sundays are single parents. A survey entitled, "The Changing Nature of Sunday 1994–1999" calculated that as many as 500,000 children could be deprived of their parent's or parents' attention on that common day off.

Of course, increased opening hours affect not only workers, but anyone living in close proximity to a large shop who has to deal with delivery lorries, customer traffic, increased pedestrian activity and so on. The fact that stores are not allowed to open until 10 am on a Sunday gives people some relief, and it is right that they should enjoy full relief on Christmas day.

I hope that the hon. Member for North Durham will find it useful if I draw his attention to three small defects in his Bill. First, it refers only to shops opening, which applies to retail workers but not to other activities. We do not want simply to transfer the burden so that Sunday becomes the big day for restocking, for example. That would affect storemen and drivers and, in areas such as mine, could result in increased, not reduced, nuisance to people who live nearby.

Secondly, I wonder whether a fine of the size specified in the Bill would act as a deterrent to a large store. I am genuinely puzzled as to why it is included.

Thirdly, I hope that what my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) said about rural exemptions will be picked up. It is anomalous that the only shop in a rural area could be affected if it wanted to provide a small Christmas service.

Shona McIsaac: But it is a large store.

Mr. Brazier: Perhaps the hon. Lady was not in her seat when my hon. Friend spoke. The point is that a shop that has just passed over the threshold might be the only one a rural area.

Mr. Paterson: It exceeds the threshold of 3,000 sq ft massively. Because it is such a successful family operation, it is now 22,500 sq ft. The definition is much too blunt. As my hon. Friend suggests, the shop provides a very valuable service in a thinly populated rural area. Another one further down in Shropshire called Harry Tuffins would also qualify. There must be several such outlets that began as little family businesses, and have all those characteristics, but are physically quite large.

Mr. Brazier: With respect to my hon. Friend, the history of the business is not the relevant point. If the shop is genuinely the only one serving a very large area and has, for example, a pharmaceutical side or sells other essential things that people might need at short notice, there is scope for an exemption. There may be several such shops around the country.

The Bill must not be seen as an attack on large stores. In supporting it, the House should commend the fact that just over 90 per cent. of them choose to close on Christmas day anyway. However, it is right to create a level playing field.

I want to close by making one more personal remark. Earlier, we discussed libertarianism. I, for one, am not a libertarian—I am an old-fashioned Conservative.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): As are we all.

Mr. Brazier: I am delighted to stand shoulder to shoulder with the hon. Gentleman on an awful lot of issues, although not, following his correspondence with one of my constituents, on people defending their homes.

My attitude to regulation is that it should be principled. I am proud of the fact that I am part of the party that, in the middle of the last century, introduced the Clean Air Act 1956, which was the first such Act and the cornerstone of subsequent environmental legislation. I am proud of the fact that in the middle of the previous century it was a Conservative Government who introduced the Factory Acts that got children out of the most dangerous places of employment. But principled legislation must be separated from the absolute detritus of paperwork that is besieging our small businesses, hospitals, schools and police stations. The Bill is an example of principled legislation: it represents a thoroughly good principle.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brazier: Happily, although I was about to sit down.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I want to pursue the issue of regulation, because it is constantly raised by Conservative Members. Which employment regulations would the hon. Gentleman like to be withdrawn?

Mr. Brazier: Every time I visit a small business, a police station, a hospital, a school, or almost any other place where people are employed, they show me the huge quantities of paperwork that they are engaged in. It would go well beyond my brief in this debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is spot on. He has allowed himself to be tempted into territory that is not covered by the Bill.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your wise guidance. I shall avoid the hon. Gentleman's blandishments.

The Bill is an example of principled regulation. It is a good Bill that will have one narrow effect that I believe will be for the good of this country. I urge the House to support it.

11.30 am

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on introducing the Bill and on putting up with all the vagaries of a Friday sitting. Some of us who are in the Chamber on Fridays more often than others are aware of the tactical to-ing and fro-ing and know how frustrating and frightening that can be. However, I am pretty sure that my hon. Friend will achieve his objective today.

I wish particularly to support the Bill because at Brent Cross in my constituency there is one of the largest shopping centres in the country. Retailing is the major employment sector in my constituency. There are more people employed in retailing than in any other form of work. The Bill is of great importance to those who work in the sector.

Those who work in retailing in my constituency come from many different faiths. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), in his peroration, set out all the different faith groups that we have in the UK. When I first read the Bill, I shared some of his concerns about whether we were doing enough to protect those of other faiths from being required to work on days that they regard as holy. However, that does not detract from the main thrust of the Bill, which is to preserve the special nature of Christmas day for families generally, not only for Christians, for people of no faith or for those with other faiths.

I think of the enormous stress and work that we place on those in the retail sector in the run-up to Christmas. People are working day in and day out, seven days a week, with no holidays. They work long hours and a great deal of overtime. It is only fair that we recognise the huge contribution that those people make, not only in making other people's Christmas happy and enjoyable but in contributing to the strength of our economy. We should recognise that by giving them at least one day off, which is absolutely clear, a year. I say to the Scrooge from Bromley—the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst—that his approach is not the way forward.

It is important to recognise that we are talking not only about shop workers but about all the other workers whose lives would also be affected if trading were allowed to continue on Christmas day. At present, transport workers will almost certainly not have to work on Christmas day. If trading were to continue on Christmas day, they would have to work. Other examples are street cleaners, parking attendants, traffic wardens and bank call centres.

Many people are affected indirectly by trading on Christmas day. They deserve the help that the Bill will give to them as well as to shop workers. The issue goes well beyond an USDAW pressure group. It affects a great many people throughout the country in all walks of life. I very much support the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on his success in the ballot and on introducing the Bill. It is an important measure.

As did my hon. Friend, I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) and for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who have raised the issue previously. They were unsuccessful in achieving what they wanted for reasons that we have heard this morning.

I respect the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who attends the House on Fridays when private Members' Bills are being discussed and advances his point of view. However, I suspect that some people will think of him as the grinch who stole Christmas, or as Ebenezer Bromley.

I pay tribute to the work of USDAW on this issue. I think that the right hon. Gentleman was unkind in his criticism of the union for the way it has tried to support its members and the industry by making Christmas a special day, as hon. Members have said it should be.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity to set the record straight by confirming that USDAW has been the fastest growing trade union and the best recruiter of any trade union over the past five years, and exposing the myth that has come from Opposition Members—that it has a problem in recruiting shop workers?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. USDAW figures prominently in my ministerial responsibilities for employment affairs, consumer affairs and competition. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the growth of USDAW's membership.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst should reflect on his party's opposition, in terms of employment relations legislation, to the union modernisation fund. Other unions could learn from the work that USDAW has done in respect of recruitment. There is an involvement in social issues that applies throughout my portfolio. I pay tribute to USDAW and to all the other organisations that have campaigned to keep Christmas day a special day.

I agreed with the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) when he referred to the Wilde quote about the price of everything and the value of nothing. That counts in this debate and the hon. Gentleman was right to make that point. He had an interesting exchange with the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst about the historical consequences of some of the things that were done when the Conservatives were in government. It was interesting also to hear the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) talking about his name being on the list that was in a former Prime Minister's handbag.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) put her finger on the pulse when she talked about the creeping commercialisation that has taken place and which has damaged—

Mr. McLoughlin: Will the Bill give the same legal ruling on Christmas day as that which applies on Easter Sunday? There are certain restrictions on

[Mr. McLoughlin]

Easter Sunday. Will the same restrictions be applied on Christmas day—in other words, the same rules and the same regulations?

Mr. Sutcliffe: As my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said in introducing the Bill, that is the intention. I am sure that he will return to that matter when he replies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport made the interesting and valid point about creeping commercialisation. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst was right to support what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said about the role of the consumer and the role of the economy generally. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on that point, if on nothing else.

There have been many interesting contributions to the debate. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) supported my hon. Friend.

The Bill contains only five clauses. There is a limit to what I can say that would go beyond what my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham has said about the measure. I do not want to go over all the ground again but I shall make a few brief remarks. I am aware that there is a great deal of anticipation about what may be happening next.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that people in the UK already work some of the longest hours in Europe, and that that should not extend to forcing people to work on Christmas day? Furthermore, does he agree that far more women are employed in supermarkets than men, and that even in this day and age they carry the main day-to-day burden of bringing up families? They, most of all, deserve time off on Christmas day. Their families deserve to celebrate the day with them. They deserve the Bill and it deserves to pass through the House.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am glad that he made the point about women workers. He will be proud of the Government's record on employment relations legislation and the introduction of the social chapter, which have developed and helped the lives of people at work.

As I have said, the Bill has only five clauses. There are 274 shopping days before Christmas, and some people may think that talking about Christmas now is premature. However, we must be aware in the context of legislation that time is an important commodity.

The purpose behind the Bill is simple. It would prohibit large shops—those measuring more than 280 sq m or 3,000 sq ft—from opening on Christmas day. The definition of large shops is the same as that which appears in the Sunday Trading Act 1994. As is the case with that Act, the Bill sets out a number of exemptions from the proposed prohibition. These are farm shops, shops whose trade consists wholly or mainly in the sale of alcohol, pharmacies, shops at airports and railway stations and shops servicing ocean-going ships, motor and cycle supply shops, stands at exhibitions and shops at petrol filling stations and motorway service stations.

The 1994 Act could be said to be one of the precursors of the Bill in so far as it prohibits the opening of large shops on Christmas day when it falls on a Sunday. However, the same prohibition does not apply when Christmas day falls on any other day of the week. I am sure that many hon. Members would agree that Christmas day stands apart from the ordinary days of the week and even other holidays; indeed an indication of this is the fact that many people—myself included—lose track of the days over the Christmas period.

In the debates that preceded Royal Assent to the 1994 Act, it was clear that there was a desire among Members that the prohibition should apply to this special occasion falling on any day of the week. Unfortunately, the very nature of the Act meant that its scope was limited to the regulation of trading hours on Sunday alone. Its provisions could not be applied to the regulation of shops opening on other days of the week and it was therefore not technically possible to extend the legislation to cover Christmas day on any day other than Sunday. I believe that applying a prohibition when Christmas day falls on a Sunday but not when it falls on any other day is an inconsistency that it is right to address; and that, while the House accepted the position in 1994, it is no longer tenable.

Enforcement of a prohibition on Christmas day trading by large shops would fall to local trading standards officers. Again, like the 1994 Act, the Bill applies only to England and Wales. With regard to Scotland, a Bill similar to this was introduced in the Scottish Parliament last year. The Bill has been put out for public consultation, after which the Scottish Executive will consider the way forward.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham has already mentioned, the Government carried out a public consultation in the summer of 2003 on the proposals to keep large shops closed on Christmas day. The vast majority of responses received were supportive of such a law; specifically, 97 per cent. expressed their support for the measures.

It is not difficult to see why these measures would be popular among the general public, and I have been pleased to hear the support from so many hon. Members today. Christmas day, for many in our rapidly changing times, represents a traditional time for celebration and provides a focal point in a busy and often chaotic period. Christmas is a time for the family; particularly, as we all know, for the younger family members. Speaking personally as a father and grandfather—[HON. MEMBERS: "Never!"] It may come as a shock to some. We must not forget the importance of Christmas for parents to spend quality time with their children.

On the latter point, I understand that the majority of those who work in the retail sector—particularly in large supermarkets—are women, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) said. Many of them are also mothers. We want to ensure that the special nature of Christmas day is preserved and enable thousands of parents to continue to share quality time with their families and friends. In the absence of other legislation covering Christmas day trading, I believe that the Bill is the best way to achieve this.

In the summer of 2002, major retailers were consulted individually on their plans for opening on Christmas day of that year and in future years, to inform consideration of whether legislation was necessary. To some extent the responses to this consultation from the retail sector itself were encouraging. It was found that the majority of large shops did not open and did not intend to open on Christmas day 2002. Nor did they have plans to open on Christmas day in the near future. However, this seemingly reassuring fact does not preclude the possibility of change were one competitor to decide to break with the pack and open. A significant number of retailers confirmed that their existing plans would be reviewed if competitors were to open. So inevitably, if one major retailer decided to open on Christmas day, the result could be a domino effect.

There have been instances since 2000 of large chain stores gauging consumer demand through market testing; that is, either through opening for a specific limited period on Christmas day or by conducting research on consumer habits and preferences in relation to Christmas day. That further validates the need for the Bill, as it seems inevitable that in the not-too-distant future large shops will begin to test the market, leading in turn to knock-on effects across the retail sector.

With this in mind, I believe that this is an opportune time to legislate. This is not only to preserve the traditional character of Christmas day but also, significantly, to avoid legislation representing a new burden for the retail sector. In other words, while it is currently the norm for large shops not to open on Christmas day, they will have little, if anything, to lose by this Bill becoming law. It will simply mean a continuation of current practice and maintenance of the status quo.

I acknowledge that there is an issue of consumer choice here—something about which certain Opposition Members are particularly concerned. This concept is important to our economy, and to some extent it is a reflection of a prosperous society, but it is also important not to be too dogmatic about it when there are other issues to consider. We have to strike the right balance between the rights of consumers and the rights of parents to spend time with their families. In this context, I believe that the right balance is in favour of the latter, as it is far more important to the fabric of our society than the desire to go shopping on Christmas day.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend think that it would assist the rights of consumers if we legislated to require that all toys and items of personal grooming should come supplied with batteries?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest that the Minister should not be tempted down that line.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I accept what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On regulation, however, we never hear from the Opposition which regulations they want to be passed.

There is a question as to why the Bill is concerned only with large shops. My answer is that of course we do not believe that every shop should be closed on Christmas day. We believe that the right balance is struck by the exemptions.

The Bill is important and I hope it gets the support of the House today. The vast majority of people—97 per cent.—want Christmas day to be kept special and we should support the Bill. In the past, Governments were neutral on the issue but this Government fully support my hon. Friend's Bill. That is why we have been working with him to make sure that the Bill is put together successfully. There is more work to be done in Committee, but I wish the Bill well.

Mr. Kevan Jones: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to reply to some comments made in the debate today. It has been a good debate, showing the cross-party support for the Bill. The debate has also shown that support for the Bill is inspired not only by the trade unions. Many people support the Bill because of their religious convictions, while others want the traditional nature of Christmas day to be retained.

The hon. Members for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) and for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) spoke about the special nature of Christmas from a Christian perspective, which is very important to many people from all Churches. We should not forget that we are a broadly Christian nation, something we should all cherish.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) holds deep religious beliefs, which came out in his speech today. The hon. Gentleman is a loss to the trade union movement, as he was eloquent about recruiting retail workers; USDAW will soon be knocking on his door for assistance.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) referred to Stan's Shop, I think on two separate occasions. He will be very popular the next time he goes into Stan's Shop for the free publicity that he has given that retail outlet today. He made a point about rural areas, and I accept that in some rural areas there are not the large retail outlets that exist in many urban areas. We could perhaps look at some of those issues in Committee, but we need to be careful. I know that there is a tradition in many rural areas—and also in many urban areas—of shops closing on a Wednesday afternoon to allow their workers to have time off because they work on Saturday mornings. That tradition still exists in some areas, and long may it be cherished, because it allows people who work in the retail trade to be compensated for having to work on a Saturday, a day that many other people—not Members of Parliament, I should add—can cherish. We already have a tradition in this country, which I think is more prevalent in rural areas, that shops do still close sometimes.

The reason why large shops are specified is quite clear. A small neighbourhood shop that is run by a family is mainly staffed by its owners and their family, whereas Stan's Shop and others of such a large size will have to bring in employees who are not family members. This Bill wants to protect those people from being forced to work on Christmas day.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on that point—most of the people who come in on Christmas day in the business to which I have referred are members of the original family. My point is that that is a small family business that has been immensely successful and is now a big one. It occupies a big area, but it has all the attributes of a small family business that the hon. Gentleman seems to admire.

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman has now got his third plug for Stan's Shop in this debate; his discount is going to be very good when he next goes there. The important point is that that is clearly not a small shop if it is the size that he has claimed. I am quite prepared, however, to consider issues of rurality.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) mentioned Harry Tuffins, which is a fantastic shop, but it originated in the constituency of Montgomeryshire.

Mr. Jones: At this rate, I am sure that some Opposition Members will get good discounts when they go in all these stores. However, I am glad that I have had the opportunity to allow the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) to make that point, so that he gets it recorded in Hansard.

I thank my hon. Friends the Members for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) and for Stockport (Ms Coffey) for their contributions. They have a long, proud tradition of association with USDAW, and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire has been very active not just in helping to protect Christmas day but in other campaigns such as the "Freedom from Fear" campaign to stop violence against shop workers, which USDAW has rightly been pressing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) referred to the multicultural nature of his constituency and the fact that people cherish Christmas day, irrespective of their religious faith. That is an important point. In the consultation, the Department of Trade and Industry received no representations from any groups objecting to the Christmas day provisions in the Bill.

Welcome points have been made about trade unions, and we had some good speeches in support of trade unions from Conservative Members.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I cannot let this opportunity pass without putting on record the gratitude that the House ought to feel to the late Sir Raymond Powell, who campaigned for so long against Sunday trading on behalf of USDAW.

Mr. Jones: I was only just elected at the time, so I did not have the honour of knowing Sir Raymond, but the work that he did to try to protect shop workers who worked on Sundays is on the record.

I welcome the important fact that some Conservative Members are now arguing for regulation. The hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) suggested that the legislation could extend to catering workers. I do not necessarily disagree with that, in that I want to protect people's employment rights, and I should be interested to see any regulations that Conservative Members wanted to introduce to prevent the exploitation of people who work in such trades.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire gave the Bill the support of the Liberal Democrats, which I welcome. That reinforces the fact that the Bill has cross-party support.

It would be remiss of me not to mention the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), for whom I have much respect. I even have a sneaking admiration for the front that he puts on and his passionate beliefs. We saw today the divisions in the Conservative party—they exist in every party—between the traditional Conservatives represented by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and the libertarian wing represented by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not agree that we want a society that allows people to do anything they want—that is the logical conclusion to libertarianism. That would mean youngsters still being put up chimneys and the excellent Factories Acts and other measures mentioned by the hon. Member for Canterbury not being on the statute book. That is not a society in which I would like to live.

Paul Farrelly: Does my hon. Friend agree that the so-called libertarian tendency really believes in freedom for the very few and a lack of it for the very many, and especially those on low pay?

Mr. Jones: Yes, that is reflected in the premise that we are all individuals and there is no such thing as society—something with which I do not agree. I think it was Hobbes who said that man's existence in such a situation was poor, nasty, brutish and short. I do not believe that many hon. Members would wish to live in such a society.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks, but to put the record straight, even we libertarians occasionally see where our duty lies. I, for example, voted against the lowering of the age of consent, because I thought it proper for the law to protect young people, sometimes from themselves.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful for that clarification—clearly libertarianism has its bounds.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned Costco. That is covered, because if people shopped there on Christmas day and purchased retail goods, the provisions in the Bill would apply. The only thing that would be excluded would be if they were buying goods for retail sale afterwards.

The hon. Member for Canterbury spoke well. He is a true believer in the Bill. He is possibly part of a dying breed, as a traditional one-nation Conservative with a compassionate side. That tendency was in the wilderness in the 1980s and the 1990s. I agree with him about the distribution industry. Pressure is not only on shops but on distribution networks to get the goods to those shops on Sundays. That is exacerbated by the procedure of delivering goods just in time rather than storing them at the point of sale. We cannot include the distribution network in the Bill, but I would be pleased to support any regulations suggested by the Conservative party or the hon. Gentleman personally to deal with the working hours of people employed in distribution.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about rurality. I accept, as someone with a rural constituency, albeit with urban problems, that there is a different dimension to life in rural areas. Perhaps we can examine that in Committee.

I again commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills).

Retirement Income Reform Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Not moved.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the House will wish to know my reasons for withdrawing my Retirement Income Reform Bill. Despite cross-party support for this legislation, the Government are still unwilling to back it, for the fourth time of asking. When I tabled the Bill in January, the Government had yet to introduce their Pensions Bill. They have now done so, but it remains deficient and will do nothing to help those who are forced to annuitise three quarters of their pension pot at the age of 75.

I am grateful to the Retirement Income Reform Campaign and to Cicero Consulting for their help. Having sought advice, I feel that the Bill would better continue its parliamentary life as an amendment to the Pensions Bill in Standing Committee and on Report. That will force the Government to confront its many merits, instead of relying on their Back Benchers to talk it out.

Genetically Modified Organisms Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12 noon

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The subject of genetically modified crops is a subject that can fill an MP with trepidation, and it is clear that it has so filled the Government deputy Chief Whip. [Interruption.] Indeed, I can see consternation on the faces of Government Front Benchers. Usually, it is the complicated science and the entrenched views held by those on both sides of the argument that put people off this subject. However, GM crops have potentially irrevocable consequences that could affect us all. Although I am only an arts graduate, when my name came up in respect of promoting a private Member's Bill, I was determined to tackle this subject, and I am jolly glad I did.

In the run-up to today's debate, I have been extremely gratified to learn of the support for my stand, not least from my own Rother district council, but also from the many letters and cards I have received from various other parts of the country. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) has drawn to my attention the strongly worded resolution of Devon county council.

I am pleased to say that the Bill is sponsored by several members of the Environmental Audit Committee, of which I, too, am a member. I am delighted to say that our report, "GM foods—Evaluating the Farm Scale Trials", has been extremely well received by the public at large. I am sorry that the Government have not taken more trouble to take on board the Committee's views. I am also glad to say that one of the Bill's sponsors is my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois)—he, too, is a member of the Committee—who is in his place. Furthermore, the Chairman of the Committee wrote to the Minister yesterday in support of the principles of my Bill. I am pleased to say that several members of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee are also sponsors. Any mistakes in the Bill are mine, but their support—and that of other sponsors on both sides of the House—adds a great deal of weight to the fundamental principles that I will argue for today.

Without wishing to get bogged down in the complexities of GM crops, I should point out that, whenever any new technology or product is introduced, it has risks as well as benefits. As a point of principle, we must preserve consumer choice and allow people to choose whether they wish to use or consume a product. We must also ensure that, if the technology could have adverse impacts on our health, wealth or precious environment, those who introduce it and benefit from it must be properly held responsible, and if necessary required to pay damages, or to put right whatever harm is done.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gregory Barker: Not at the moment; I want to make some progress, if I may. One does not need to be a scientist to understand that freedom of choice and producer responsibility underpin my approach. It does not matter whether one is in favour of or against the commercialisation of GM crops: those are the basic rules, and we should all subscribe to them. That is what my Bill seeks to achieve for GM crops.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My understanding is that this is a Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Bill that would normally be answered by a DEFRA Minister. Do you know whether the Government will be providing a Minister at least to hear the arguments, if not to give DEFRA's opinion on the matter?

It was definitely the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs who made the GM statement to the House. It is rather odd, therefore, that there is no DEFRA Minister present to hear the arguments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Government are represented on the Front Bench, and the Chair cannot intervene beyond that. It needs to be well observed that events on Fridays sometimes do not follow an entirely normal course, which may explain the current absence of a DEFRA Minister.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Following on from the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), is it not at the very least a discourtesy, if not sheer indifference, to the House that the Government have not seen fit to provide a full team of Ministers to cover the full set of Bills before the House today? Surely the Government cannot make casual assumption that Bills will take this or that course. It must be right for the Government to supply proper Ministers to deal with Bills in the order in which they appear.

Mr. Miller rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let me try to deal with the matter. There is no genuine problem of order. The Government are represented on the Front Bench, as I said. Whether or not the absence of a DEFRA Minister is intentional is entirely another matter. Circumstances are such that no DEFRA Minister is in his place at the present time, but that is not a point of order for the Chair because the Government are represented on the Front Bench.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I entirely accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the Government are represented on the Front Bench. We all realise that, but as I understand it, the Minister present is from the Department of Trade and Industry. Have you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or any other officials in the Speaker's Office, been given any information this morning of a Government reshuffle, which would explain the change of responsibilities?

Mr. Miller rose—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me tempt Mr. Sutcliffe to contribute.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am pleased, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you protected my status as a proper Minister. I am a Minister based in the Department of Trade and Industry, which other parties are trying to do away with. The DTI is very interested in all aspects of the business of the House and will pass on to the appropriate Ministers anything that is raised in the debate.

Mr. Miller: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not more appropriate—you, Sir, may wish to discuss the matter with the Speaker—when there is a change of business on a Friday brought about by the mechanism of Bills being withdrawn, that prior notice be given of that change? That is important, because it affects the workings of Front-Bench and Back-Bench Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair cannot control every event occurring in the House. Members sometimes take initiatives, involving motions to sit in private and so forth, which can completely alter the order and time taken on particular items of business. No one knows before the start of business whether a Bill will be dealt with in 10 minutes or five hours. In the best of all ordered worlds, both the Government and Opposition Benches should be manned for the appropriate legislation. The Chair expects that to happen, but nothing out of order has taken place and I believe that we should now move on.

Gregory Barker: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think I can shed a little further light on the matter. I received a letter from the Minister for the Environment at 6.30 yesterday evening, in which he said:

"I will of course listen carefully to what you have to say in support of your Bill on Friday and judge it accordingly."

What could possibly have happened to that Minister from 6.30 last night, when he said he would be in his place listening to the debate on my Bill? Perhaps it is a cause for concern or a cause of consternation for the Government Whips. Perhaps it explains why the Government deputy Chief Whip has scuttled off.

I want to press on, in the hope that at some point the DEFRA Ministers will turn up. I return to the issue of freedom of choice.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gregory Barker: No, not on this point. We have done it to death.

All crop seeds have the potential to mix with other varieties, and GM crops are no different. They can be mixed by cross-pollination, when the pollen of one crop is blown or carried by insects from one plant to another. They can be mixed when birds or animals eat or otherwise transport seed to other fields. They can be mixed if a field is planted with a GM crop one year and a non-GM crop the next. Some of the seed will inevitably remain in the ground and grow later than intended, mixing with the following non-GM crop. Such plants are known as volunteers. Humans, too, can mix the seed, in farm machinery or silos that are not completely emptied of one batch of seed or crop before another is added or when seed is spilled in transportation. Seed can be mixed by accident at the grain merchant.

The point is that if GM crops are allowed to mix with non-GM crops, it will not be possible for a consumer who does not wish to eat GM food to be able to buy GM-free products. It is clear that many people want to continue to buy GM-free products.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Welsh Assembly has had much debate about this issue, and it shares his concern that unless we do something about it now, our choice will be removed by default?

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman makes his point well.

Mr. Watson: The hon. Gentleman has outlined the principles behind the Bill and some of the challenges that GM food poses for retailers. Has he managed to inform Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth about his Bill? What are their views on his Bill?

Gregory Barker: If the hon. Gentleman occasionally read the newspapers, he would know that Friends of the Earth has been extremely helpful in the drafting of the Bill. All the environmental groups have taken an interest, although they do not all entirely agree with what I am doing.

Mr. Miller: I am concerned not with the principle of what the hon. Gentleman seeks to do, but with the methodology. The Bill would regulate in a very prescriptive manner, but does that not go against the basic tenets of his party?

Gregory Barker: I do not intend to respond to time-wasting interventions. If the hon. Gentleman had read the Bill carefully instead of having just been passed it by the Whips, he would find that what he alleges is not the case.

The Government's "GM Nation?" debate found that 86 per cent. of respondents did not want to eat GM food, something that our retailers—even the large supermarkets—have long recognised. Indeed, none of the major supermarkets goes out of its way to stock GM food. To preserve the choice that our constituents clearly wish to continue to exercise, we have to prevent the contamination of non-GM crops with GM traits. GM crops must be required to be planted according to rules that govern separation distances and planting intervals, as well as according to farm hygiene rules that prevent equipment from being used for GM and non-GM crops simultaneously.

[Gregory Barker]

I hope that so far I have followed a logical path. I know from meetings with the Minister, who is unfortunately not in his place, that the Government agree with me that we need a co-existence and liability regime—

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I beg to move, That the House do now sit in private.

It appearing on the report of the Division that 40 Members were not present, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Question was not decided, and the business under consideration stood over until the next sitting of the House.

Gregory Barker: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Through the most shameless and despicable use of House procedures, the Government have deliberately killed off my Bill and the debate on it before I had got even halfway through my speech. Yesterday, the Minister for the Environment wrote to me saying that he would be here to hear my Bill and to judge it accordingly. How can anyone ever trust not only this Labour Government but DEFRA, when a Minister deliberately tells untruths in a letter and refuses to come to the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going much too far in his remarks. It is certainly not a point of order for the Chair. The procedures of the House have been observed correctly and the Chair has no control over the actions that are taken provided that they are in order. What has happened has happened.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The issue of genetically modified organisms is a matter of enormous national controversy and the House is as divided as the general public. It is simply unacceptable that a Bill of this nature that asks Parliament to decide the nature of regulation should be closed down and that a Minister should not come to the House. Is it possible for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make representations to the Minister that he should come in future to debates that concern his Department?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The importance of a particular matter cannot be decided by the Chair. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that any particular matter that hon. Members wish to have debated on the Floor of the House should be taken up with the usual channels.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the case that it is, indeed, the role of Parliament to determine that? If the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) had secured the support of even 40 of his colleagues, he could have continued with his peroration and his Bill might have been able to proceed, but as he did not have the support of his own side, it fell.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These points of order are turning into a debate. They are not for the Chair—[Interruption.] Well, we will try one more.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In more measured tones, will you accept that on reading Hansard on Monday, people will find that 23 people voted in the No Lobby? It was not 23 Tories because, as a matter of fact, there were six or seven Labour Members. It was a cross-party Division. Let the facts speak for themselves—they only got about 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the record will show that. No hon. Member who is experienced in Friday sittings will be surprised by what happened, but what has happened has happened. It is in order and we should proceed with the other measures on the Order Paper.

Performance of Companies and Government Departments (Reporting) Bill

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [30 January], That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question again proposed.

12.31 pm

Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My recollection is that when the Bill was previously considered, the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Andy King) had finished introducing it and the Minister was in the middle of his remarks. Surely the hon. Gentleman cannot speak again without the leave of the House, and, unless we hear from a Minister, should we not move on?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for making that plain, but we had to get the ball rolling. The Bill is now before us and we are continuing an adjourned debate.

12.32 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): This is something of an unexpected treat.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): For all of us.

Mr. Dismore: For the whole House, no doubt. I had expected to speak at some length on the Bill before last, but happily I did not spend too much time preparing for it, and I have not spent much time preparing for this Bill. As will be apparent, I support it and regard it as important.

I want to draw attention to a few reports that show where companies fall short of the high standards that we expect of them. All the reports have been published since our last debate on the Bill. According to a report by the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, labour standards in the high-tech computer sector are among the worst in the world. Systemic problems of unsafe working conditions, compulsory overtime and poor wages falling below the legal minimum are just some of the catalogue of examples found in factories in Mexico, Thailand and China.

In Brazil and Kenya, Christian Aid continues to report extreme health and safety violations of tobacco farmers who supply to major companies, such as British American Tobacco. In Nigeria, communities report ongoing problems with oil spills, emanating from Shell's operations there.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of the report by the Public Accounts Committee, which looked in detail at the smuggling of tobacco? It specifically mentioned Imperial Tobacco and the lack of co-operation at that time with Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in reaching a memorandum of understanding. Is he aware of any information relating to China or anywhere else which would put Imperial Tobacco in the frame in the same way as BAT is now in the frame?

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who, as a former member of the Public Accounts Committee, is well placed to make that point. I am afraid that I have not read that report, but I am sure that the management and board of directors of the companies to which he has referred will be in some trepidation when they see the contents of this Bill, if those are the sort of business practices in which they are engaged.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): My constituents have written to me in support of this Bill. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not only conditions of workers that are at issue, but activities such as supply of baby milk to countries where it can lead to deaths of infants and what companies are doing to promote GM crops, which perhaps our constituents would not want? What about the mining activities by companies in the great lakes region in Africa? Are those companies stimulating some of the civil war that has affected Burundi, Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo? People want some reporting on those issues.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes the point strongly. There is a range of issues, such as those to which she refers, on which companies must take greater responsibility. My sole concern is that this Bill is only being introduced this year—we should have had such a Bill decades ago. I remember looking at reports of cases of asbestos workers in South Africa who were poisoned by big asbestos companies and are now trying to fight for compensation. Their claims were resisted tooth and nail by those companies all the way up through our courts here, until finally, for once, the judges got it right and allowed those people properly to bring claims for compensation. That is exactly the sort of problem with which we should be dealing.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): What would the hon. Gentleman say to the organic farmers of Herefordshire, which has more organic farms per hectare than any other county in England, whose crops might be contaminated by genetically modified crops? What would he say in defence of his Labour colleagues who have just caused a Division that has effectively meant that an important private Member's Bill has now been lost, which might have had a chance for further debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. That intervention is way outside the scope of this debate.

Mr. Dismore: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. All I would say is that the hon. Gentleman makes an important point about genetically modified organisms, which raises an issue in relation to corporate behaviour. He may be interested to know that I share his views about corporate behaviour in relation to genetically modified food, and I regret that he could not summon enough Liberal Democrat Members to support the previous Bill, or enough Conservative Members, or enough between them, to do so.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just ruled that discussion on the topic of the previous Bill is outside the scope of this debate.

Mr. Dismore: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was getting a little carried away.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): I have in my constituency a running shoe manufacturer called New

[Tony Cunningham]

Balance. It is the only running shoe manufacturer that produces running shoes in the United Kingdom. All the other companies—Reebok, Nike, Adidas and the rest—produce in far-flung parts of the world. Is this Bill designed to look at those sorts of companies, which may be producing their running shoes in ideal conditions, while in some third-world countries workers could be suffering from poor health and safety and so on. Is this Bill designed to examine those issues?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point about looking at the performance of companies in this respect. We have all read stories and seen television documentaries about companies in the far east, for example, employing child labour on a penny or two a day. That is completely exploitative and outside any form of proper reporting and control. If companies are engaged in those practices, shareholders and the wider public ought to be aware of it. Of course, the issue goes beyond unfair labour practices elsewhere, to fairness of competition and trade with legitimate companies such as that in my hon. Friend's constituency. How can that company compete fairly when other companies behave so improperly and badly, undercutting its legitimate business?

Andy King: I am sure that my hon. Friend is also aware that large multinational companies do not just behave disgracefully towards their work force, as in terms of the computer issue. In places such as Plachimada in India, Coca-Cola took away drinking water, which is necessary to sustain life, and Shell is of course notorious for its activities in the Niger delta. Such companies put whole communities at risk, yet they are not held to account by their shareholders.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point about Coca-Cola and water. Recently, there was a scandal in our own country when Coca-Cola had to withdraw its bottled tap water because it was not safe. That was a rip-off, if ever there was one. That is an example from the developed world of a company that has misbehaved in the developing world, in India.

Mr. Gardiner: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill will provide tremendous assistance to pension funds? The Government introduced a provision whereby investment companies must issue a statement of investment principles by which the funds must abide, and which their trustees must observe. That is especially relevant in the context of exercising corporate social responsibility, given that those companies are some of the major shareholders in many multinational companies on the index. Having analysed their investments, their shareholders will be able to exercise their vote at annual general meetings. The Bill would allow the shareholders of those companies to analyse their investments and to vote at annual general meetings with a clear knowledge of the social responsibility of the activities in which they are engaged. That will—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is rather long for an intervention.

Mr. Dismore: I thank my hon. Friend for his excellent contribution. I hope that he will have the opportunity to develop it after I have concluded my remarks.

I want to put my hon. Friend's point in a slightly different light in relation to ethical investment companies and pension funds. When I recently had a financial health check with my financial adviser, who no doubt tried to bamboozle me, I was astounded, when I looked at my pension, that the small amount of money that I had put into an ethical fund had performed much better than the funds in the general market. That is a sign of the times. People are much more interested in knowing where their money is going and what the companies that they are investing in are up to. That is why my hon. Friend's Bill is so timely. It catches the spirit of the age—the zeitgeist that allows us, as investors, to ensure that our money is invested properly based on companies' reports of what they are doing.

Ms Drown: Does my hon. Friend agree that that is true not only of investment companies? Many people have expressed concern about call centres going abroad. Nationwide, whose headquarters are in my constituency, recently stated that it was going to keep its call centres in Swindon, which is a great reflection on the staff there. That is the sort of decision that people want to know about; certainly, Nationwide's financial performance is reflecting it. Similarly, there is huge increase in interest in fair trade. People want to know about what companies are doing, and the Bill would assist that.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; she makes a good point. The issue of call centres is a difficult and thorny one. Personally, I do not necessarily object to their going overseas. The real question is whether the people who work in them are being exploited, and that would emerge clearly from corporate reports that deal with the subject, as they would have to under the Bill.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will recall that earlier in our debates a point of order was made to Mr. Deputy Speaker, who was then in the Chair, stating that there was not an appropriate departmental Minister on the Front Bench. That matter was pursued extensively by Conservative Members, yet the Members on their Front Bench are not the appropriate shadow Ministers for the relevant Department—the DTI.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is on the record, but it is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Dismore: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Before the last round of interventions, I was talking about the problems in Nigeria in relation to Shell's operations, especially in the context of oil spills. We have all read a great deal in newspapers recently about that company and its lack of social responsibility towards the people of Nigeria.

Tony Cunningham: Earlier today we had the successful Second Reading of the Christmas Day (Trading) Bill. It was helped through its Second Reading by a trade union, which provided support. If the Bill before us passes through the House, I hope that it would allow people to know whether companies that have dealings in other parts of the world accept and encourage trade union involvement and trade union membership. We know that in this country that is acceptable. Would it not be as well if people knew what companies were doing in respect of trade unionism in other parts of the world?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. When we are talking about organisations such as those in the oil industry, it is extremely important. We are not thinking only about terms, conditions and wages—we must also have regard to health and safety. Many companies operate in ways that are downright unsafe.

Recently, a multinational company was describing to me its health and safety record with particular reference to fatal accidents. In Europe, those accidents could be counted on one's fingers—that is if one still has them! However, there were more people killed by this one company worldwide than the whole of the people killed at work in the United Kingdom in a year, twice over. That shows that while in Europe we may have a strong attitude to health and safety, that does not apply in the rest of the world. My hon. Friend is right to highlight the role of the trade unions on health and safety. An inquiry into health and safety is being conducted by the Select Committee on Work and Pensions. Trade unions are important when it comes to terms and conditions, and especially important in the context of health and safety at work.

It is easy for us in the west to take for granted the right that is guaranteed by all the international conventions to organise as a trade union. We know that there are many dictatorships throughout the world that operate hand in glove with some rather despicable companies, which will deal only with sweetheart trade unions or which actively fight against trade unionism itself. Many people have died in the developing world, particularly in south America, for the right to be represented by a trade union. It is an issue on which companies should report back to their shareholders in the developed world.

Andy King: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that the Bill has the full support of every trade union in this country and that of the TUC, which has written to me offering its full and unqualified support because of the benefits that the Bill would bring to the very workers to whom my hon. Friend has referred.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention because it significantly emphasises the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham). The trade union movement is an international movement. An important reflection of the good work that our trade unions do is the attempt to promote decent labour conditions for workers internationally, often in circumstances where they are not able to look after themselves.

Amnesty International continues to be the leading source of information on human rights abuses, where business has failed to act within their sphere of influence, or sought to avoid responsibility altogether, through legal means. That includes, for example, BP's negotiation within the context of the Baku-Tbilisi oil pipeline.

If I were to draw a thread through all these different stories, including those to which I was referring before I was intervened on, I would ask what they all have in common. Concerns have been expressed by stakeholders who have been unable to articulate their concerns by issuing reports, by media attention or by direct lobbying. Most of these issues have failed to appear in corporate social reports. Why is that? Is it perhaps because those companies are unwilling to explain what has been going on? Is it because no one wants to be seen to be taking a lead for fear of creating a disadvantage for their company?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend has been most generous in taking interventions. Does he agree that some of the very principles with regard to stores that felt a compulsion as a result of their competition opening on Christmas day on the basis of which we were earlier urging this House to pass legislation to prevent Christmas day trading are exactly the same as those that apply here? There are companies that fear the impact on their own share price and operations from doing the right thing and publishing each year a statement of their socially responsible activities. They fear that unless we act, they will be disadvantaged in the commercial arena.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a strong point that I was starting to develop. Blue-chip companies may like to do that, but nobody wants to be seen to be the one putting a toe in the water. All our companies and employers—not just trade unions—would also see the benefits of the Bill.

Tony Cunningham: In Burma, Aung San Suu Kyi has been under house arrest for many years and democracy has broken down. Many people would not want British and European companies to invest there, but they need to know whether companies are investing in a country with such a regime. I hope that the Bill will provide them with the information.

Mr. Dismore: That is a strong point. The question is why people want to know that information. There are two or three different reasons. The first is whether they are happy with their money being invested in a country such as that. But there may be big corporate investors who are prepared to see that done for profit but also prepared to put pressure on companies in turn to pressurise the regimes to try to move towards democracy. My hon. Friend makes an important point about Burma, where a number of UK companies invest. If some of the shareholders, pension fund members and people with individual pension rights knew where their money was invested, they might well put pressure on those companies to improve standards throughout the developing world in their operations, as well as on Governments to clean up their acts.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): The hon. Gentleman may be a sponsor of the Bill and will be au fait with its contents. Companies such as Clarks of Somerset produce all their products in China and what are known as third-world countries, but comply with the Bill's provisions. What advice has he sought from such companies?

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting intervention. Such companies have a lot to gain from the Bill. The same situation applies to the company that makes training shoes, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham). Companies with decent labour standards and proper health and safety regimes have nothing to fear and everything to gain from the Bill.

Andy King: In addition, decent companies in this country fully support the Bill. The Co-operative Bank, which is thriving, is fully behind us, as are British Telecom and B&Q. A lot of companies are saying that the time has come to act together so that they are not undercut by the worst.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because he mentioned some important companies. The Co-op bank is a major finance business, and B&Q brings in raw materials from all over the world, particularly timber, in respect of which there are issues involving hardwood. It is interesting that BT, a high-tech company, also subscribes to the Bill, which goes back to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) made about call centres.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; he shows extraordinary generosity of spirit. May I add Tetley, which is based in Greenford my constituency, to the list of companies that operate ethically? Tetley has been ethically sourcing tea for not the past five or 10 years but for the past 15 years, because it recognises that it has a global duty and an imperative to act as an ethical sourcer in the growth and boxing of loose tea. It has been extraordinarily successful, even though it has had to withdraw from some of its tea-growing operations in Zimbabwe and China. Does he accept that there are some good companies and that, in a reverse of Gresham's law, the good might possibly drive out the bad?

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. When he mentioned Tetley's, I wondered whether we were going to go down the beer route, which would have been interesting.

Mr. Pound: Not during Lent.

Mr. Dismore: Given that we debated Christmas day earlier, we seem to be having a day of religious festivals.

My hon. Friend is involved in Labour Friends of India, and has a large Indian community in his constituency, so it is important to him that the tea company in his constituency is shown to be using proper practices in the region where many of his constituents have their roots. It is a double bonus for him to have such a company on his patch.

Why do such issues not at present appear in corporate reports? Is it really because companies do not think that they are likely to have any impact on shareholder value until they pose a clear financial risk? Shareholder value, however, is the starting point of the founding principle of the Government's proposed operating and financial review. Some people involved in the company law review process, such as civil society groups, are calling for an operating and financial review that addresses the interests of all relevant users, including shareholders, consumers, employees, communities and charities. The company law review has accepted that premise, and argues that an operating and financial review should be prepared for members and other users. However, the proposals are still aimed primarily at members' interests alone.

The proposed operating and financial review must ensure that companies take into account and disclose a range of impacts on relevant stakeholders, instead of perpetuating the status quo, which is based on companies' voluntary good will. Do businesses currently report on what is important to other users? Some might, but not all. Looking at the leaders in corporate social responsibility, there are significant gaps between companies' social and environmental concerns and their financial considerations. When a business makes a decision, it must arguably consider several issues beyond financial impact, including legal implications and the risk to its brand reputation, but business decisions rarely allow a stakeholder interest to overrule financial concerns if it has no proven financial bearing. In forward-looking strategies, unless there are clear financial risks, business will do what is best for business as it perceives that in its short-term, blinkered view of the world today.

Mr. Gardiner: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a parallel with the change in the legislative and regulatory environment in local government from compulsory competitive tendering to the best-value regime that this Government introduced? Previously, local authorities were obliged simply to look at the cheapest price for delivering a service, whereas they can now assess "value" much more widely. Does not the Bill seek, in many respects, to do the same for business? A business should not simply consider the cheapest price at which it can produce its product in a given area but the overall value that accrues to the consumer, and to society in general, as a result of its interventions.

Mr. Dismore: Again, my hon. Friend makes a cogent point. That is the nub of the debate. We want companies to look more broadly at the wider range of stakeholders and people who may be affected by their operations.

We have had such laws for a very long time. The Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 gives companies duties towards the general public. Here, we are asking companies merely to tell us what they are up to, and then perhaps market forces, paradoxically, will do the trick.

Mr. Pound: I do not have my copy of the Register of Members' Interests to hand, although I know that my hon. Friend knows it by heart. Does he agree that many right hon. and hon. Members who rightly list their directorships, in certain cases in companies dealing in tobacco, for example, might set an example to the House and to the nation by insisting on this form of disclosure, and in the absence of legislation for it, perhaps even arranging to do so themselves?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I am a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee, but I do not know the register inside out. We consult it only when we are investigating someone.

It is amazing that the only representative of the Conservative party here today is the shadow Minister, and the same goes for the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Gardiner: He is not a shadow Minister.

Mr. Dismore: Whatever he is, he is sitting on the Front Bench. Perhaps he will clarify what he is doing here.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I am a member of the Opposition Whips Office, and as such a shadow Minister.

Mr. Dismore: Perhaps the Liberal Democrat spokesman can make a similar declaration.

Mr. Keetch: As the Liberal Democrat shadow Defence Secretary, I have an important interest in defence matters in this debate, which is why I am listening attentively to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dismore rose—

Gregory Barker: May I also add that, as a member of the Environmental Audit Committee—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) must respond to the first intervention before taking a second one.

Mr. Dismore: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The Conservative representative has clarified his position as a shadow Whip. Perhaps he can whip in some of his colleagues today, and in particular those who have the shareholdings that have been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound). Perhaps then they can answer for the companies of which they are shareholders and, I suspect, directors, and defend them at first hand in relation to both the Bill and the issues that have been raised today. I suspect—my hon. Friend may be able to supply the detail shortly—that some of them may be a little worried about the Bill, because it may expose them as directors of companies involved in nefarious practices in the developing world.

Gregory Barker: As well as a shadow Whip, I am a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, so this is a subject that I am especially interested in and sympathetic to, but I caution the hon. Gentleman that, at his instigation, we have tested who is in the House today, and it transpires that only six Labour Members were prepared to go into the Lobby, versus 16 Conservative Members, so it ill becomes him to speak about Members not being here, especially as he has destroyed a very good Bill.

Mr. Dismore rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that, rather than responding to that intervention, the hon. Gentleman will continue with the debate on the Bill.

Mr. Dismore: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) spoke about the interest of the defence industry in the Bill. He may wish to make a fuller contribution later, but I invite him to say a little more now.

Mr. Keetch: The defence industry clearly has an interest in the Bill, and I should point out that, as the Register of Members' Interests confirms, I am a non-executive director of two companies based in my constituency, neither of which has activities outside the United Kingdom. Indeed, one of them does not even have activities outside Herefordshire.

Mr. Dismore: I am sure that the House has heard the hon. Gentleman's declaration, and for the avoidance of doubt, I have no directorships whatsoever.

Mr. Pound: Is my hon. Friend aware that the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) has registered nine shareholdings in the current register, but that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We really must return to the debate currently before the House.

Mr. Dismore: I am sure that we can examine the hon. Gentleman's shareholdings in the Tea Room afterwards.

Ms Drown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for intervening, as we were getting a little off track. That said, this is a good debate and I wish that we had more such debates. Does my hon. Friend recognise that the danger with a Bill such as this is that one adds more and more elements to it, and that it is important that regulation is not burdensome? Has he any thoughts on how we can encourage appropriate reporting without the system becoming too big, burdensome and costly to companies? A balance has to be struck in that regard.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. The Bill makes a useful contribution to the debate and is a good start. I suspect that it has little prospect of becoming legislation, but my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Andy King) has done us a great service in bringing these issues before the House and at least kicking off the debate. The best way forward is for business to listen to this debate and to engage with those of us who feel strongly about these issues. It is clear from her interventions and her work outside this place that my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) feels strongly about them.

[Mr. Dismore]

The CBI and the large companies represented by such organisations should engage with us and start to develop some solutions. We have witnessed the failure of voluntarism, but perhaps the one or two good companies that do want to make progress could become pilots and flag-bearers for business organisations. Notwithstanding the ignorance of the reporting, if shareholders were to say at annual meetings, "We know that there is no law requiring you to act in this way, but we as shareholders are insisting that you do," we might start to make progress. In that regard, and as my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon says, this debate is important and valuable.

I was talking about business strategies and what business gets up to. A good example is the construction of an oil pipeline or dam. As we have seen throughout the developing world, such projects are often completely rejected by local communities. However, the voices of those communities are seldom, if ever, heard. If they are heard, they are seldom, if ever, the crucial factor in the business decision as to whether that oil pipeline or dam should go ahead. Such decisions are taken irrespective of environmental, cultural or social damage.

We have discussed the idea that the operating and financial review should not be a full social and environmental report, and that only key performance indicators should be included, yet some businesses will assume that if they have done the OFR, they have done the job. Furthermore, what they chose to include in the final report would be a matter for them. Such an OFR could therefore have an adverse effect, resulting in companies disclosing less, not more. However, the Bill requires an OFR that ensures that companies report on relevant social, environmental and economic impacts and performance, thereby providing both shareholders and stakeholders with an informed assessment of companies' operations and financial positions. The Bill also sets out the matters that should be included in the OFR, and those matters that directors have a duty to consider in order to allow an informed assessment. Moreover, it provides a process for signing off the review. It determines which major companies must publish an OFR—approximately the top 1,000 United Kingdom companies—but more importantly, it allows the OFR to bring in more companies in future.

In addition, my hon. Friend's Bill will amend the basic duties on company directors to include social and environmental impacts by requiring the director to promote the success of the company while having to consider all factors of potential risk, including impacts on communities and the environment, among other matters. Where possible, directors must also reduce damaging impacts on the environment and communities.

We have had some six years of consultation on the review of company law, and we should use every opportunity to ensure that legislation includes the requirements that many of my hon. Friends believe should be implemented, as we have heard in today's and previous debates. Regulations for the operating and financial review were promised in the 2002 White Paper, which has been followed by further consultation, and still more consultation is due when the review is published.

Tony Cunningham: The Government chief scientific adviser recently said that climate change was perhaps a greater danger to the world than terrorism. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if companies in this country are developing techniques—whether it be for oil, coal, gas or whatever—in other parts of the world, that contribute to climate change, shareholders and stakeholders should know that such activity is going on?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend once again makes a cogent point. There is always considerable debate about climate change. We need only reflect on the weather to see how the climate has changed—whether it be the consequence of CFCs in the atmosphere or whatever. I believe that there is now overwhelming evidence that corporate activity, particularly in the developing world—logging, for example—can have a major impact on the climate not just for individual countries but worldwide. The British public should be aware, in taking investment decisions, of what contributions companies are making towards resolving that extremely serious problem that the whole world faces.

To conclude, I remind the Minister that commitments were made in 1994, reviews begun in 1997 when the Government came into office, and the challenge was put to business in 2001—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): My hon. Friend is making an excellent speech on an important issue. Like him, I am pleasantly surprised to have an opportunity to debate the issues today. I hope that he is pleased to know that the Government were the first to introduce a Minister with particular responsibility for corporate social affairs.

Mr. Dismore: I hope that my remarks have done nothing to detract from the Government's achievements so far. We are now examining corporate responsibility in a wide range of matters, not least corporate manslaughter. I have taken a strong interest in that matter for some time.

The Minister is right that the Government have already done a lot, but what we are discussing now is very important, going beyond the narrow confines of company law. Even though the Bill amounts to company law reform, it affects the investment decisions made by everyone who has a pension fund. It affects the way in which our big companies behave worldwide. It is an essential reform. It is now opportune, after the challenge put to business in 2001, for social and environmental concerns to be crystallised into company law. The Bill will make that happen. I strongly support my hon. Friend, who has done the House a great service in introducing the Bill. I hope that he will make at least some progress today.

1.13 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore). We have had an interesting

Friday morning. Friday mornings are a time when the House debates matters in a way—different from during the rest of the week—that few people see. We have had both good humour and bad temper in this morning's debates. However, we are now debating provisions on which there seems to be a good measure of agreement across the Chamber.

I want to focus my remarks on the importance of corporate social responsibility, reform and the wider impact of the proposals not just in our society, but throughout the world. The Government set up an independent company law review in 1998, and I commend them for that. It was intended to establish fundamental reform of the framework of core company law. The company law review published its final report in 2001, and the first part of the response was published in 2002, in the White Paper "Modernising Company Law". As I understand it, the Government remain committed to the implementation of their proposals for company law reform.

Two of the main recommendations of the company law review were, first, that there should be an accessible, codified statement of the general duties that directors owe to their company as managers and monitors, embodying a modern, inclusive view of the range of decision making and objective standards of professional skill and care, tailored to the role of the individual director. The second principal recommendation was that all companies of significant economic size should be required to produce, as part of their annual report and accounts, an operating and financial review—the OFR, as my hon. Friend called it. That recommendation is reflected in clause 1(1) of the Bill, which states that a major company must "prepare an operating and financial review."

The intention of the Bill is not to focus on smaller companies. Right at the beginning, it explicitly mentions major companies and tries to recognise the impact that they have on the wider community.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is right to point out that the Bill imposes an obligation on directors to prepare the OFR. The review reports to the members of the company, but interest in it will go beyond those members. The Bill performs a neat conjuring trick, in that while remaining within the confines of company law, it will ensure that the wider public can have a greater understanding of how companies operate.

Mr. Gardiner: In a good debate, ideas feed off each other, and the intervention that I made in my hon. Friend's speech earlier has now come back to me. The wider interest that must be generated by an OFR is in the wider community's involvement as shareholders in the company. That will drive the company towards better and better practice, because it will know that when investors read the OFR and consider the wider implications of investing in that company, they will have some tough decisions to make. Investors will have to pay great attention to the sometimes damaging effects that a company can have before deciding whether to invest in it or not. That will promote better practice and companies will be forced on to their mettle to clean up their act.

A good example of that was provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), who used to work for a multinational oil company. She and a number of other people were studying the plans for a new plant that was to be built in an African country. My hon. Friend felt that something was not quite right about the plans, and when the meeting broke up she kept the plans to study them overnight, and found out that there was no filtration plant at the appropriate point to stop effluent being gunked out into the local community. When she pointed that out the next day, there was a bit of a silence and the people responsible for drawing up the plans said, "That's quite deliberate". There was no law to oblige that company to include such environmental controls.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I am sure that my hon. Friend will be pleased that the Government are supporting the UN global compact that Secretary-General Kofi Annan announced in 1999, which sets out principles for business on human rights, labour and the environment, and would cover the circumstances he describes.

Mr. Gardiner: Indeed. I wholeheartedly support the Government's actions in that respect. My hon. Friend is right to point out that those things need to be tackled internationally.

Andy King: It is important that the Government put their money where their mouth is. The Prime Minister issued a challenge to the top 350 companies in October 2000: to issue OFRs by the end of the 2001. However, only about 20 per cent. of them actually did so. We are lagging behind. Denmark has introduced mandatory reporting, as have the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden, yet the Department of Trade and Industry says only that we will soon be bringing forward OFRs. How soon is soon? It has taken six years so far—surely it is time to do something?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point in support of his Bill and I agree; it is time to act. It is shameful that companies issued with that challenge have ignored not only the Government's directive, but also public will in this country. People certainly want OFRs to be set up so that there is a clear understanding of the impact of companies' practice in the areas and countries where they operate. It is a matter of the public right to know. Shareholders have the right to know what is going on so that they can make the appropriate decisions. They should be able to find out—if they want to know—how their money is being invested, and whether it is being invested in companies that behave in a socially responsible manner, as I believe the vast majority of shareholders want them to. We all have a stake in this matter; for example, those of us who share in pension funds.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I do not necessarily disagree with the general tenor of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I should like some reassurance. Will he confirm that he is not suggesting that legislation is required because we think that the majority of companies are irresponsible? From my experience in industry, I know that Procter and Gamble was always highly responsible internationally. Does he agree that, although there are details that could be discussed in Committee, the principle is not that everyone is guilty until proven innocent? The Bill would simply ensure that companies that transgressed internationally, perhaps significantly, were publicly brought to book.

Mr. Gardiner: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for guarding my back. Before I became a Member, I ran an international company in the City for 10 years. In that respect, I am very industry-friendly. I understand the constraints of running an international company and am aware that the vast majority of such companies and their directors want to operate properly and ethically, for the benefit of the wider community. I welcome that. However, it sits ill with that when only a small percentage of major companies are prepared to prove their good intentions by producing an OFR.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend with some of the figures: 132 of the FTSE 250 companies report on environmental performance, with a further 100 reporting on social and ethical issues. So there is still a long way to go, but progress is being made.

Mr. Gardiner: Indeed, progress is being made, and I understand that, in many respects, it is better that companies willingly make progress. No one wants to drag companies kicking and screaming into declaring such matters. We want co-operation, and I am sure the Government want co-operation. Of course that is a tremendously sensible way to proceed, not just for FTSE 100 companies, but for all the companies involved who are saying, "This is what we want to do. We want to be open and transparent."

I remember speaking to Chief Justice Verma, a former chief justice of India, who is now a human rights commissioner there. He had a wonderful phrase, "Sunlight is the best disinfectant." That touches the heart of the matter. Putting forward the OFR and allowing transparency and all the facts to be available is the surest way of companies cleaning up their acts.

Lembit Öpik: As Sunlight is a Lever product, I would suggest that Fairy liquid is the best disinfectant. From my experience in Procter and Gamble, I think that that company would say that it could use its impeccable standards, especially in international investment, as a competitive advantage. I have not been asked to raise this on its behalf, but it might ask why it should be made to do something that responsible companies already do effectively, without being made to by law. Given the Minister's statistics, will the more successful companies not report anyway, over time, because they will understand that not doing so puts them at a competitive disadvantage?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from, but the counter-argument is, "Look, if you are already doing this as a responsible company in the community, what can possibly be your objection to the regulations stating that you ought to do it?" If companies want to do something, surely they cannot object to the regulations stating that they have to do so, particularly as their competitors, who may have good reason not to want to do it because they may be shown in a disadvantageous light by comparison, will be forced to do it.

The perverseness of the argument that the hon. Gentleman makes—I will not call him my hon. Friend, as that would only ruin his career—is that those good companies that are already happy to put such information into the public domain may perceive a benefit to them by being contrasted with their competitors who do not put it in the public domain. They may perceive that they can then claim that they are more virtuous and more likely to attract investments from the ethical funds and managed trusts that want to invest ethically, and hence that they may gain a competitive advantage over those who do not conform as they do; so they may be against such legislation for that reason. That may simply show the labyrinthine workings of my mind, but I am sure the hon. Gentleman would agree that that perverse argument may encourage companies to favour worse practices than those that they themselves carry out.

Mr. Dismore: There is another aspect to the debate. Clause 9 is entitled "Promotion of company's objectives", so is it not an enabling power? At the moment, directors may wish to do the socially acceptable things that we have been talking about, but may feel constrained by the existing restrictions of company law, which says that they must act in the best interest of shareholders. Clause 9 would enable directors to act in a socially acceptable way even though they may feel constrained from doing so at present. The problem is not just reporting, but enabling directors to act.

Mr. Gardiner: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. Clause 9 states:

> "A director of a company must in any given case . . . act in the way he decides, in good faith, would be most likely to promote the success of the company."

Mr. Sutcliffe: That throws up the question about the work that the Government have been doing on the Tyson report, on who should be company directors. Company directors should reflect society, and my hon. Friend may want to say something about that.

Mr. Gardiner: I confess to my hon. Friend that the Tyson report is not a part of the Government's work about which I have read a great deal. If he wishes to enlighten the House further, I shall be grateful to hear from him.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. The Tyson report talks about who should be company directors. It says that they should reflect the make-up of society—for example, there should therefore be more women on company boards. The Tyson report, which the Government have accepted, is a major step forward, because it would help the way that people look at these issues—whether social, environmental or whatever. It is an excellent piece of work.

Mr. Gardiner: I am certainly happy to agree with the general thrust of my hon. Friend's remarks. A good company will wish to reflect the community that it serves. It can improve its capacity to serve the community by more closely representing the make-up of that community. I certainly would not support any arbitrary notion of imposing directors on companies; that would be wholly redundant and not the way forward. The directors appointed should be those most capable of taking the company forward, but my hon. Friend makes a good point when he says that women are under-represented as directors in some of the major companies in the UK. I know that the Government are working to redress that problem, and we should support them.

Andy King: Does my hon. Friend agree that the issue relates not just to the directors but to the investors in companies? The Bill would give more power to shareholders so that they can become enlightened shareholders, obtain a true picture of the activities of their company and begin to shape those activities in a more sustainable way.

Mr. Gardiner: That is absolutely correct. One of the most significant changes that the Government have made on this issue is the vesting of responsibility in the trustees of pension funds to make a statement of investment principles. They must report on that each year in their annual reports, and the statements must take account of social and ethical matters. Exercising corporate responsibility as investors has now been placed on the trustees of pensions funds, and that will have one of the most dramatic impacts in improving the practice of companies. They will feel the heat from their corporate shareholders. They will have to act responsibly to attract the investment funds that they need to expand their businesses and to perform well in the market. They will have to ensure that their statement of corporate social responsibility is made public, and made accessible to shareholders; and that, when the shareholders read it, they do not blanch at what their money is used for. I have no doubt that that will create short-term turbulence in the stock market and in those companies, but the long-term impact will be highly significant. I welcome the Government's intervention.

Mr. Dismore: Does my hon. Friend also agree that it is important that the public know where the buck stops? Clause 10 is important. It significantly limits the powers of delegation of a director so that people know who is responsible for the decisions taken.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend is correct. He highlights the delegation and independence of judgment that is required. A company director must not, unless authorised to do so by the company's constitution, or as a result of any decisions as set out in clause 8, delegate any of his powers or fail to exercise his independent judgment in exercising his powers. The provision not to alienate his powers and not to be at arm's length from the decisions that his company makes is critical.

Clause 9 provides that a director must "take account in good faith of all the material factors that it is practicable in the circumstances for him to identify", and take

"all reasonable steps to minimise the impact of the company's impact on the communities that it affects and on the environment."

Let me give a good example of a successful company in the UK that operates in precisely that way and fulfils Government policy in, perhaps, unexpected ways in an unexpected area. Timbmet sources timber from around the world and supplies it to the building trade in the UK. The company recognises that people in the UK, and in particular their Government, do not want any destruction of the rainforests and want the continued growth of forests of hardwood trees, which, unlike pine tress, which grow within 20 or 30 years, cannot simply be cut down and replenished. Hardwood trees have lifespans of 200 or 300 years, and sometimes longer.

Timbmet has engaged in a careful programme of identifying sustainable ways of supplying timber into the UK market. On the other hand, the Department for International Development has included in its country strategy paper on Cameroon, which has substantial forest resources, the importance of considering the impact on wildlife and the environment of the interventions that it makes and of its development interventions through aid.

It is often the case that an aid programme, such as the promotion of a new road through a community, has great commercial benefits in linking towns and communities that were separated, and in enabling a country to develop. No one knows as well as the Minister the importance of transport infrastructure in facilitating development. However, roads can have a devastating impact on the environment and wildlife.

The bushmeat trade used to be localised within selected, very poor communities in that part of the world, which depended on it for protein and have done so for generations. They were tremendously badly affected, because hunters from the cities used the new highways to come into those communities, snare wildlife, take it into the cities, and develop what has become an international trade in bushmeat. That is an example of the unexpected and perverse impacts that can result from otherwise good and sensible development proposals that bring real economic benefits to a community.

To return to corporate and social responsibility, Timbmet has formed an alliance with the bushmeat campaign in this country, has initiated programmes and is working with the Government, who have just issued the AFLEG—African Forest Law Enforcement and Governance—declaration, which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for International Development signed a few months ago in Ghana. That company wants to maximise its beneficial impact on the community in which its centre of operations is located in west Africa. It has also recognised how the consumer market works in the United Kingdom. It has decided that it is imperative that it operates in those communities in a way that is beyond reproach.

Timbmet has thus established its credentials in the construction industry in this country and the rest of Europe as a supplier of timber that can be certified as coming from sustainable sources. I should mention in passing the tremendously good work of the Forest

[Mr. Gardiner]

Stewardship Council in that respect, in providing one of the few effective certification processes for timber around the world. Timbmet is also able to match the Government's aspirations, as their procedures state that wood used in construction by the Government must come from sustainable sources. That completes the chain, which goes right back to some of the poorest communities in the world, by ensuring that the pathways opened up into the forest by Timbmet's work are not used by hunters. That initiative protects those local, indigenous people who have depended on bushmeat, cane rat, duika and bush antelope for years, as a way of topping up their protein intake, and who otherwise would have been forced into food poverty as a result of a timber trade that came in and merely allowed hunting to continue on the back of it.

The impact of industries and companies on communities is incredibly diverse. It is sometimes difficult for Members to appreciate just how far the ramifications of such a seemingly dry Bill can be felt in communities throughout the world.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is correct to draw attention to the breadth of the environmental issues that the Bill addresses. I want to point out to him an issue that has so far been omitted from our debate: protection of the marine environment. We have looked at forestry and land-based problems, but the marine environment is also significantly under threat. Does he have some observations about that?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend tempts me down yet another route on a matter that he and I have debated at great length in the past. He is absolutely right; one need only consider the pollution of our seas and waterways. In using the word "our" I do not mean to suggest that the situation is confined to the United Kingdom. I pay tribute to the work that the Environment Agency has done over the past few years to improve the watercourses in this country.

It is absolutely critical that companies take into account the water supply of the areas in which they operate. My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth described how Coca-Cola's location of its operation in India used up the local people's water supply. One would think that those people must have felt great joy that a major multinational company was locating in their area as they thought of the prosperity and employment opportunities that it would bring with it. That is true, and it is welcome that such inward investment goes into developing countries. However, unless those companies operate within clear parameters that protect the local community and the very essentials of its life, they are not welcome, because they are not acting in partnership with that community, but behaving in the same manner as the Danes in this country 1,000 years ago by pillaging its resources.

Gregory Barker: I am struck by the hon. Gentleman's comments about procurement from the third world. I want to draw his attention to the report on Government procurement that was undertaken last year by the Environmental Audit Committee, which highlighted the scandal surrounding the procurement of wood for the Cabinet Office. Similar things have happened in other Departments. Does he agree that before hon. Members start lecturing business, the Government should clean up their act?

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. Gentleman is an avid reader of parliamentary questions, he will know that I have tabled more than 120 on the timber sources used by the Government and by each Department—a subject that is very close to my heart. The hon. Gentleman is right that it is important that we in Parliament should get our act together—indeed, it is an absolute priority. It is difficult to stand up and preach to industry and the rest of the world about what should be done unless we are following those procedures ourselves. I am delighted to say that all the Departments to which I put my questions about the procurement of timber were able exactly to describe the parameters of those processes and to say that they specify that hardwood should come from sustainable sources.

As the hon. Gentleman is a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, he will recognise that it is very difficult to track back the certification process. I mentioned the Forest Stewardship Council and the tremendous work that it does on enabling that to happen, but it is one organisation and we are talking about a global trade. When a supplier presents somebody with a certificate saying, "This has come from sustainable sources," there are very few ways in which they can be 100 per cent. sure that that is the case. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would pay tribute to the work that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development did with the Government of Indonesia when he was in the more junior ministerial position in that Department. He worked with them to ensure that the entire process of governance within that country, including the timber industry, enabled proper certification to take place.

There are an infinite number of links in the chain following the moment at which a piece of timber is cut down in the forest until it takes the form of sawn timber and arrives at a building to be turned into a door, a door frame or whatever. Unless every link in the chain can be certified, it is difficult for us to say, "We rely on the fact that we have a policy. We rely also on the fact that we have a formula that states that the material has come from sustainable sources." It is not enough for us to adopt the right policy. There must be an onus at every stage in the commercial chain, which goes right back to the forest, to ensure that we can properly identify the product that we eventually use.

I rose to talk about the reform of company law and the Bill, and I fear—

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend has made an excellent speech, as he always does in the Chamber, on a Friday and at other times.

We are talking about a global situation. That reinforces why the Government need to ensure that we have high-performance companies and high-performance workplaces. All the issues that my hon. Friend has raised are global and there needs to be a global solution. Is he proud of the fact that the Government, since 1997, have supported a global approach in every instance?

Mr. Gardiner: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention. He draws me back to my theme and to one of the major points, and that is that the Government have sought to be what all Labour Members would welcome, which is an internationalist Government. We must recognise that there is no such thing as getting something right in one's own backyard because it is intimately connected with the rest of the world. For things to be right in our backyard, it is necessary to ensure that everybody else is operating to the same standard that we wish to see domestically. I know that that is what the Minister believes, and it is what I believe. Many Labour Members would say that it is simply the Socialist International working properly. It is what the Government are trying to do, and I am delighted to support my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), I serve on the Environmental Audit Committee. I can confirm that the Committee has looked into these matters in detail and has expressed considerable concerns. There has been a lot of upset about the way in which the Government handled the procurement of some of the timber for the new Home Office building. Will the hon. Gentleman accept, without my wishing to make a particularly partisan point, that the Government need to try harder to put their own house in order? All members of the Committee have been pressing that point.

Mr. Gardiner: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that I have been extremely upfront in my own acceptance that this is a matter that we, as a Government, have to get right. I am provoked to say that at least we have the right policies in place. At least we are setting the right standards and trying to abide by them. The hon. Gentleman must accept that for 18 years in this place that was not the case. We did not have those standards. Had I asked 100-odd written questions under a Conservative Administration 10 years ago, I would not have received the same answers from the Department concerned, setting out the good practice policy that we as a Government have implemented. I accept that it is not enough to have the right policies. We must ensure that we get things right, that we abide by our policies and that our suppliers abide by them. It is easy to say, "Well, it was in the contract. We did not realise that the suppliers were not doing what we wanted." Of course the Government must monitor their contracts properly. However, as I said to the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), sometimes, unless certification processes are in place, it is difficult to monitor effectively. That is why it is vital that the responsibility be placed on industry and carried down the chain; in large part, that is what the Bill will deliver in just one of its aspects.

Mr. Sutcliffe: On Government procurement, the Government's investment in the public services will give my hon. Friend more examples of how large amounts of money going into the public services will make things better, as opposed to the Conservative party's policy of reducing investment.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend is right. Awarding contracts and commissioning from companies and industry allows the Government to determine the terms of contracts and set the standards. The Government have spent billions on 14 new hospitals already built and 78—or is it 178?—in various stages of construction, as well as on new schools. It is open to the Government, quite properly, to specify the standards that they want and to ensure that corporate social responsibility and environmental standards are met. We have to follow that up by delivering the proper monitoring processes to ensure that that happens.

The Select Committee on Trade and Industry published the "Modernising Company Law" White Paper in May 2003, which, again, broadly welcomed the Government's proposals. What does the Bill propose on the OFR? The Bill reproduces the draft clauses on the OFR that were included in that White Paper, but with a few significant changes. Broadly, the Bill would require all major companies to publish an OFR, the objective of which was to permit the members—the shareholders—of a company to make an informed assessment of the company's operations, financial position, future strategies and prospects and impacts on the environment and on any communities in which the company operates.

Major companies are defined essentially as companies that will fill at least two of the following three conditions and are not subsidiaries of another European economic area-registered company. The first condition is that their turnover should be at least £50 million; the second is that the balance sheet total should be at least £25 million; the third is that they should employ at least 500 employees.

Opposition Members should not use that example to jump up and down to talk about red tape. From the remarks of the two Conservative Members who have spoken, I would not expect them to do so; they have indicated that they are broadly in favour of the Bill. I have no doubt, however, that should the Bill pass into law, it will be added to their list of red tape initiatives introduced by the Government. But this is red tape that the Opposition support and which we support; this is red tape that tries to improve the way in which companies operate.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend raises another important point on regulation. In an earlier debate, I tried to tease out from the Opposition which employment regulations they were against. That is a continual challenge that we put to the Opposition, who talk glibly about red tape but never tell us which regulations they want to get rid off.

Mr. Gardiner: That is absolutely correct. I look at all these dreadful regulations and red tape brought in by the Government and then I look at their effect. Their effect has been that we now have a national minimum wage for the first time, at £4.85.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we are wandering a little outside the scope of the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: I will observe your gentle caution, Madam Deputy Speaker, and return to the theme of our debate, because you are absolutely right.

The White Paper's proposals were far from perfect and it made it clear that they were a preliminary draft, designed to aid discussion rather than to give a conclusive view on the best legislative approach. The main changes from the White Paper proposals to the Bill are these. First, the OFR will always have to include information on the company's impact on the environment and on any communities in which the company operates. That is in clause 1(3)(d). Secondly, there is a power for the Secretary of State to make rules by negative resolution, although the purpose of such rules is not clear. That is in clause 1(9) and (10). Thirdly, the wording on employment, environment, social and community issues has been changed, I presume in an attempt to make it broader, although the effect is again uncertain. That is in clause 3(2)(c) to (e). Finally, the Bill would apply equally to private and public companies, whereas the White Paper proposed higher thresholds for private companies. I believe that the Government are in any case likely to propose different coverage in the draft regulations now being prepared.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend's speech is so excellent that I shall take the opportunity now, rather than mentioning this later, to announce that the draft regulations will be ready after Easter. The delay with the OFR has been raised with us before, but the draft regulations will be launched after Easter.

Mr. Gardiner: I am delighted to have that assurance from the Minister, and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth will be as delighted as I am to hear that that is the case. We feel that the delay has been unacceptable, and it is good to know that there will be progress in very short order. We welcome the fact that the Government are going to publish their draft regulations in the near future.

The OFR will improve corporate governance by increasing transparency and accountability. It will provide better and more relevant information on businesses for shareholders and will enable investors to make better decisions, thus improving confidence in financial markets.

Andy King: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his excellent contribution to this excellent debate. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for announcing that the Government will issue the draft regulations after Easter. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) has teased out a few differences between what was in the White Paper and what is in the Bill. The Bill is not set in stone, and the whole point of producing it has been to get the debate going. I believe that we have gone a long way in that respect. We want to get the Bill into Committee so that we can put it into shape and adjust it as necessary. That is why I would be delighted dutifully to amend certain aspects of it in Committee.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sure that the Minister will have heard that offer from my hon. Friend. I pay tribute to him, because he has introduced his Bill in a most distinguished manner. He has argued his case with passion but also with the great reasonableness that the whole House recognises characterises him as a Member. He has put forward a strong case, and whether or not the Bill ultimately goes into Committee—I wish it a fair wind in that respect—I am sure that he will take great comfort from the fact that he has brought it to public attention. The Minister might not be able to accept it publicly, but my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth has pressed the Government's heels on this matter, and he will be delighted when that bears fruit after such a short time in the publication of the draft regulations.

One of the main benefits of the OFR is that directors will need to identify and report on all factors that are key to the past, present and particularly future performance of their business. It is not intended to replicate or replace the social and environmental reports that many companies already publish. It is not the place for general reporting on environmental and social factors for the public interest. However, it will include disclosures on such factors where they are material to an understanding of the business, and it will be for the directors to decide what is material.

The Government have set up a working group, which will shortly publish guidance, and I am sure that the draft regulations will be significantly different from the White Paper and the Bill, partly in order to implement aspects of the EU modernisation directive of 2003, and partly to reflect developments in policy in the light of responses to the White Paper and further work, including technical improvement of the drafting. The intention is to publish a consultation document, including the draft regulations, as soon as possible.

What does the Bill propose on directors' duties? It reproduces part of the Government's draft statutory statement of directors' duties, but with one significant amendment.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Would my hon. Friend care to refer to consultation with organisations such as Business in the Community? We talk about regulation and red tape, but much good work is done in consultation with Business in the Community.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course, consultation with business is absolutely vital. We need business to be able to feed into legislation that concerns it. When its interests are to be materially affected, it is right to consult it at every stage, and I welcome the discussions that have already taken place.

The amendment to directors' duties is to impose a responsibility on them to take all reasonable steps to minimise negative social, environmental and economic impacts, while at the same time requiring them to act in a way that is most likely to promote the success of the company for the benefit of its members.

I believe that the Bill will create best value in companies. It tells them to look beyond the financial bottom line to the community bottom line. It says that they should not only maximise profit for shareholders, vital though that is, but consider how they are creating value in the community that they serve. A dry Bill alone cannot do that—it has to be at the forefront of directors' minds. I look forward to the day when Government, working with industry, can achieve that.

2.9 pm

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Andy King) on securing this welcome debate. I am only sorry that it is being held at the expense of my own Genetically Modified Organisms Bill, but I guess that, as this is my Dispatch Box debut, from adversity springs opportunity.

As we have heard, the Bill would provide for the production and publication of annual reports on the social, environmental and economic impacts and performance of companies and Government Departments. As someone who is interested in the whole green agenda, I am very pleased to be able to respond to this debate.

I should like to begin by making it clear that I am well aware of the need to be concerned about the harmful impact that some corporate activities can have on the environment and on local communities. All of us who want to promote sustainability would welcome greater transparency and better practice. However, at the same time I believe that the main priority of business and its most important contribution to society is the creation of wealth and jobs and the provision of goods and services. Winning orders and contracts might sound mundane, but it is central to the success of our economy.

It is clear that a balance must be found. I have been struck by the wide consensus that exists in respect of this issue, which is indeed about finding the right balance. The Bill's aims are not in dispute, but there is a genuine debate about whether they should be pursued by encouraging and nurturing best practice, or through regulation. Corporate social responsibility is important, but we must also recognise the primary necessity of encouraging wealth creation, for it is only through wealth creation that we can fund all the improvements in public services that our constituents rightly demand.

Social responsibility can indeed aid productivity and enhance a company's reputation among consumers. Britain has a pretty good record in this regard; indeed, the best performing companies on the stock market are often those at the forefront of best practice. Yet initiatives such as this can also inhibit commercial success. Policy makers have two options: the first is to impose legal requirements that businesses must meet—the Government are very good at that—and the second is to promote a voluntary approach, outlining the responsibilities that businesses should accept in the interests of all shareholders and all stakeholders. The choice is the classic one between carrot and stick.

It is my instinct and that of my party to be very vigilant in respect of any measure that might increase regulatory burden. I know that the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke extensively, is very relaxed about increasing regulation, but we Conservatives do not share his laid-back attitude to the ever-rising burden of red tape on business.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I welcome him to the Opposition Front Bench; hopefully, this could be the start of a long career. Given that there have been some notably poor performances by major corporate companies, does he feel able to support the Government's efforts to improve public confidence in the way that they operate? How should one balance the use of regulation against the performance of certain companies?

Gregory Barker: I do not have enough time to discuss particular companies, and to be honest I am not sufficiently well briefed to give the Minister an expert answer on the performance of individual companies. However, as someone who has worked in the City and in business, my feeling is that, by and large, British companies do a pretty good job and can hold their heads up high in the world. Indeed, they have often been at the forefront in encouraging and nurturing best practice. We should not be ashamed of our businesses; rather, we should be proud of what they achieve daily. I am not here to berate businesses, but I do want to encourage them to be better, and to take that best practice abroad and share it more widely. We must continue to be vigilant in terms of increasing performance.

There is no doubt that socially responsible programmes have the potential to bring benefits to business and to society as a whole; as such, they are to be welcomed and encouraged. However, too much compulsion can hit competitiveness, particularly of smaller firms, give less responsible firms an advantage, and even give the whole agenda of corporate social responsibility a bad name.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman talks about small companies, but has he read the Bill? If he had, he would know that we are talking about companies with turnovers of £50 million or balance sheets of £25 million or with more than 500 employees. Those cannot be viewed as small companies.

Gregory Barker: If the hon. Gentleman were familiar with the definition of small to medium-sized companies, he would know that by stock exchange standards that is typically taken to mean companies with a valuation of anything less than £250 million—or, in some cases, less than £500 million. That definition may exclude basic trading companies, but many small companies with a market capitalisation in excess of £100 million—perhaps on the AIM market or approaching a stock market flotation—could find their performance greatly inhibited by burdensome regulation.

My concern is that there are risks in the imposition of legal requirements, so it is vital not to force socially responsible initiatives on to business without proper and due regard to their impact on Britain's ability to compete. If business is faced with rising costs, the ability to win orders and create jobs is affected and all members of a community—rich and poor alike—may be made worse off. Regulation reduces economic freedom and deprives people of opportunities. That is the great risk of introducing a statutory approach to corporate social responsibility. The potential for harm caused by the imposition by the Government of a legal framework, including too many onerous standards and policies, is an important consideration.

As I said, it all comes back to a question of balance. I prefer to encourage business itself to take the lead in dialogue not just with politicians, but with other representatives and stakeholders in the community. A lightly regulated business environment, which promotes a dynamic economy, is the most important force in creating the fairer society to which we all aspire.

[Gregory Barker]

In summary, I am broadly sympathetic to the aims of the Bill and I am glad to see it debated here in the House, but I am keen to see that it is neither too bureaucratic nor too prescriptive. Accordingly, my party will encourage the Bill into Committee for further detailed debate. At the same time, we will insist on a proper regulatory impact assessment so that the costs as well as the benefits of the measures in the Bill can be rigorously scrutinised.

2.17 pm

Roger Casale (Wimbledon) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on his debut at the Dispatch Box. Given the strength and brevity of his contribution, I am sure that we will hear many more fine performances from him in the future. We can all agree that we have heard many fine performances in today's debate.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to make a brief contribution because I represent a constituency with a high percentage not only of shareholders, but of professional and managerial people who are active in international companies and in many Government Departments. It was interesting to hear the expertise and comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), and I would also like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Andy King) on introducing the Bill.

It has not featured much in today's debate, but my hon. Friend also includes the actions of Government Departments—the public sector, not just the private sector—in the scope of the Bill. Many examples spring to mind. From the recent Budget we know about job changes in the Department for Work and Pensions—and other Departments—that will affect many of my constituents who live close to, and work in, central London. There is also the action of St. George's trust in disposing of land in my constituency, which will have considerable environmental implications. I would certainly like to see a more rigorous approach towards assessing the environmental and social impact of various Departments.

My constituents, like those of my hon. Friends, will be attracted by the touchy-feely appeal of the notion of corporate social responsibility, but the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle was right to say that we should be cautious about what that will mean in practice and, in particular, for the bottom line. However noble our social and environmental objectives, we have to let businesses be run as businesses. We must not give them any other objective than being successful as businesses. To be successful, they must aim at maximising shareholder value and making a profit. Some directors and shareholders may go into business because they want to make a wider contribution to society, but the way to do that is to run a successful business and then invest the money made in other social projects—give it to charity or invest it in other ways.

At the same time, however, we must realise that the notion of shareholder value—which companies and directors have to maximise—is changing, in a changing world. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North spoke about best value, but I prefer to refer to the notion of enlightened shareholder value that recognises that if businesses are to be successful in the long term and in a sustainable way, they must be held to account in relation to wider objectives such as those that we have debated today. The Bill is desirable for exactly that reason.

The Bill is necessary, but when we review it in Committee we will need to take a cautious approach to how it will work in practice. One of the issues that will enjoy closer scrutiny in Committee is the question of whether the regulation should be mandatory or voluntary. We should not be too inhibited by the prospect of regulation because the Bill does not seek to introduce more red tape. Instead, it would introduce what may become known as green tape—something that will help companies to resist actions that would be damaging to the environment and, therefore, to the relationships that they have with clients and suppliers. Green tape could also prevent companies from damaging their reputations and, therefore, their long-term business interests, as well as assisting long-term sustainability.

Should the legislation be mandatory or voluntary? Well, we are talking about minimum standards. We want to encourage best practice, and Business in the Community has been mentioned as one vehicle among many that does that. However, we should not forget the extent of malpractice that occurs. We have seen several terrible business failures, with consequences on a massive scale, including Enron and Equitable Life. The people most affected are often those with investments—the rich and powerful—but we are considering the impact on local communities from job losses and environmental problems. Just as we seek to be tougher in the regulatory framework on business malpractice in the financial sector, we should introduce proper measures to prevent malpractice in relation to social and environmental concerns, which may affect all of us. I favour a mandatory approach, but we will return to the matter in Committee. The other aspect that we should focus on is the criteria. When the Bill was debated in January, it was made clear that whatever regime is introduced, it must be transparent and fair.

The point about consultation with the business community has not been made strongly enough. The Government have not said, "We know all the answers, we're smarter than everybody else. We know what to do, thank you very much. Here are our laws." They want to work in partnership to solve the problem. The Government will listen carefully to any proposals for legislation to bolster corporate social responsibility and will build on the excellent relationships that they have forged with the Federation of Small Businesses and other bodies representing business. The same thing applies locally. I am in close consultation with the Merton chamber of commerce in my community, which helps us in our work. I am sure that business representation will be clear and helpful and will assist us in framing transparent, specific legislation.

To return to my original point, society has changed. Sustainability is at the heart of our considerations on how best to secure the future of our local communities and on ensuring a fairer global business community. Our market economy must be underpinned by a strong and effective regulatory framework. Citizenship involves rights matched by responsibilities. The idea that such responsibilities and duties should apply to corporate entities is much stronger than ever before.

Much of company law is backward looking. These proposals are forward looking and will help companies to prepare for the future and could have a positive impact on their business success, which has to be the bottom line. I am delighted to add my contribution to a debate in which there has been a high degree of cross-party support for an important measure, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth on introducing it.

2.26 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I think we all agree with the intentions of the proposals; the question is the degree to which they should be mandatory.

As hon. Members may have realised by now, I once worked for a multinational—Procter and Gamble. I chose to work for the company because I thought it acted with social responsibility, even though that was not mandatory. Members may not know that when there is an oil spill, Fairy liquid is used to wash the birds—not for public relations but because Procter and Gamble believes in doing the right thing. It is a shame that we seem to be saying that people will only start to act responsibly if it is made mandatory.

Employees are more inclined to stay with a company if they feel good about its values and feel that it is making a contribution to the community. Procter and Gamble did a lot of outreach work in schools and so on. When the Minister responds, I hope that he will assure us that the Government are not as cynical as that mandatory approach might imply and that he believes that good, responsible companies will act positively because they and their staff want to do so.

I came into politics because I think that human nature is basically good and that people will generally try to do the right thing without needing to have the Government breathe down their neck. Those who want to do otherwise will always find a way through and, looking at some of the provisions, I am worried that words such as "fairness" could be interpreted negatively by cynics. If the Bill goes into Committee—I am sure that the Minister will keep his contribution brief enough to allow that to happen—it is on such points that we shall push the most.

I agree with the intention behind the Bill but, as a Liberal Democrat and a positive politician, I still think that the human race is generous-spirited enough to do the right thing without always having to look over its shoulder for the law.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Things are improving. The last time we debated private Members' Bills, I had a minute and a half to wind up the debate; today, I have two minutes.

I never cease to be amazed by the way we manage to get things done in this place. I anticipated making long speeches on previous Bills this morning, but that I would have no opportunity to speak on this Bill. I am delighted that we have been able to debate it, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Andy King) on introducing it. My Department has had a previous opportunity to respond to it, and I am grateful to be able to talk on it today.

There have been tremendous contributions from lots of hon. Members—notably, my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner)—and I would find it difficult, even in two minutes, to respond in the necessary detail to the many issues that they have raised.

There is always a balance. That is why I tried to draw the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on his views about regulation—

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 30 April.

Remaining Private Members' Bills

PROPERTY REPAIRS (PROHIBITION OF COLD-CALLING) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [12 March], That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 30 April.

Tyrannical Regimes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): One year ago, I helped to organise the largest revolt within a governing party in modern parliamentary history: 140 Labour Members of Parliament. We sought to dissuade the Prime Minister from joining President Bush's premature, counter-productive and premeditated war on Iraq. We failed, but those who won the vote also failed. Lessons must now be learned by all of us. Humility is not a quality for which politicians are renowned, but perhaps all of us ought to take a step back to see how we can learn the lessons, how we can move on from where we are now and, above all, how we can unite on how we can better meet the challenge of tyranny next time around.

I totally endorse the Prime Minister's call to reform international law and on the United Nations to find a better way to deal with the next Iraq. Sadly, that was not attempted in the six years before the conflict. In his Sedgefield speech a couple of weeks ago, the Prime Minister certainly talked the talk, but if it is to be more than the rhetoric of triangulation, it must be the prelude to decisive, vigorous executive action, led by the Prime Minister, of the sort that he demonstrated so ably in the prelude to the Afghanistan conflict.

The Prime Minister is right to state that the old doctrines of state sovereignty and territorial immunity are inadequate to tackle tyrannies. Those doctrines should be replaced by international standards, defined and enforced by the United Nations, not by the Bush doctrine—a blanket authority for any strong country to shoot its way into any weak one and depose its Government at a time of its choosing. That way lies international anarchy and the law of the jungle in which terrorism breeds so virulently.

My first question to the Minister runs through my contribution: what action have the Law Officers and the Foreign Secretary and his team taken in this field over the past year? Despite the time that Her Majesty's Government have had to devote to much of the media trivia on Iraq over the past year, can he demonstrate that we have moved on, that we are already acting on the big picture and that we are not just waiting until the Secretary-General's high-level panel reports some time next year?

The Prime Minister's call could not be more timely, for while the Bush doctrine is dead, it needs someone of international stature and a friend of America to give it the last rites and move on to something more sustainable. The Democratic challenger in the American presidential race, John Kerry, has already made it clear that he favours international, rather than unilateral, action to deal with the threats of terrorism and weapons proliferation that confront the United States and the world. That is a key battleground for the American election, and all the American people are looking for a more effective way to protect their security over the next four troubled years. The Prime Minister, therefore, has a time-limited opportunity to rally American and world opinion behind the logical and compelling proposal to reform international law and to confront the weakness of the United Nations.

A robust legal and institutional basis is needed to allow the international community to act quickly and decisively—not qualities that were evident over the past 18 months. However, at the same time, it should not allow individual states to take the law into their own hands. In the terms of the old-fashioned western, nations should act together as a posse not as a lynch mob.

One of the tragedies of the US neo-conservatives' learning-on-the-job philosophy was that the decision to go to war was settled long before the public justification had been devised. From axis of evil to regime change to humanitarian intervention to weapons of mass destruction, the public reasoning and the supporting evidence that was required changed constantly—sometimes from day to day—often contradicting itself, and that inspired the mistrust that divided our Parliament and, indeed, the world.

Where do we go from here? It might be helpful to start from first principles. When might it be right for one state to use force against another? International law already recognises the right of a state to defend itself against actual or imminent attack and the right and duty of a state to defend another from attack. After 9/11, the Security Council acknowledged a new principle. A state attacked by terrorists may take action against any state that harbours them even if that state did not play any direct part in the terrorist attack.

Another situation is when a state commits abominable crimes as an act of policy against people within its own territory. If those people have no hope of relief from those crimes in their own country, they must look outside for protection. States have regularly intervened to protect their own citizens from the crimes of another state, but increasingly they have shown themselves willing to protect other people to whom they have no direct obligation. That has happened in many places, often belatedly: East Timor, Kosovo, and Iraq in relation to the Kurds. There is an underdeveloped but none the less evolving law of humanitarian intervention. It provided the best reason for a timely invasion of Iraq rather than a premature one, although, sadly, that was not the pathway chosen by the allies last year.

The right or duty of humanitarian intervention has also been applied to states living under anarchy rather than tyranny—"failed states" whose Governments lack the strength or will to protect their citizens from civil war, lawlessness, disease or famine. In all those cases, there was a developing international consensus before Iraq that national sovereignty has limits and is subject to conditions.

Indeed, the Prime Minister, by his gruelling efforts on behalf of us all on Afghanistan, had done more than anyone to help the world to build a global coalition against the threat of terrorism. Building that global coalition against terrorism was tragically interrupted and discredited by the misjudgment over Iraq. That coalition must be rebuilt. Our Law Officers and Foreign Office Ministers must now enter a permanent session with their international colleagues to reform international law and provide a ratchet of graduated practical action through the United Nations.

Some of what I propose already exists, but what we need most at the table is the political will to make it work—determined yet painstaking. That is the Foreign Office's, the Prime Minister's and Britain's greatest challenge but potentially their greatest contribution to the new global order. This is not some starry-eyed utopianism that goes back to the League of Nations in the 1930s, but a tough, practical necessity as we count down to the next crisis—and we do not know where that may come from.

A right of intervention, especially armed intervention, must be codified in a reform of the United Nations charter. One possibility is that the UN could declare a state of emergency, but I think that the words have a legal connotation and may not be appropriate. I am sure that the Foreign Office can come up with a better formulation, but that will do me for now. A state of emergency could require the restriction or even suspension of the sovereignty of a member state. It would cover the use of that member state's resources by terrorists, gross human rights abuses by its Government, or an actual or incipient humanitarian catastrophe. Such a declaration might be sought by any member state, including the proposed subject, so that countries in the grip of famine, plague or civil war could ask the United Nations to take control of all or part of their territory.

It should also be possible for the United Nations to hear appeals for such a declaration from oppressed peoples—whether from exile groups or human rights organisations—and to satisfy itself that such appeals are authentic and representative. If we can build a United Nations capable of making such a declaration, it could authorise or enjoin member states to take action to remedy the conditions that had led to it. That might include armed intervention, but the UN would decide what action to take, not individual member states.

The UN might decide not to declare an immediate state of emergency, but to establish instead a clear set of escalating conditions that would lead it ultimately to make such a declaration. The escalator must be made unequivocal. It must be clear to all those, wherever they are on the globe, who tune in to see the debates and hear the decisions that the UN makes on behalf of us all. As far as possible, it must be made invulnerable to the lawyer's wriggles and political spin that so discredited UN resolution 1441, which was twisted into an excuse for war despite earlier categorical assurances that "it was not the trigger for war".

In future, the UN should set out its decisions in clear language, understandable to anyone in the world, and try, as far as is humanly possible, not to use diplomatic double-talk such as "serious consequences" or "all necessary means", which involve so much interpretation and misinterpretation that they engender mistrust and discredit the process that we must rebuild for all our futures.

The proposal does, of course, raise difficult questions, and it will not be easy. None the less, the concept of a UN state of emergency offers some hope and a way of tackling 21st-century problems by consensus. Its very existence could induce Governments to behave better, whether towards their own subjects or the outside world. That influence would be reinforced if all member states, including President Kerry's America, accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court and stripped members of vicious Governments of any immunity from prosecution.

Much more could be said on the matter, but I shall be brief. There is certainly a case for random UN inspections on the use and control of traded weapons of any kind. However, weapons of mass destruction entail a threat of immediate devastation to civilian life on an altogether new and frightening scale. The risk of them falling into the hands of a vicious Government—still more into the hands of terrorists—requires new forms of action by the international community.

Every state in the world should subject itself to a compulsory random and intrusive UN inspection of the kind that we all demanded of Saddam Hussein. The inspectors should verify not only whether a state possesses or produces weapons of mass destruction, but also its systems for controlling them and its doctrines for their use. Biological weapons must also be properly included in such an inspection regime. The UN produced a model of how to do that when the inspectors returned to Iraq and imposed increasingly demanding conditions on Saddam Hussein. Indeed, it is ironic that almost everything that was done in Iraq was a triumph of principle and of lawful and effective action until the premature invasion.

All those ideas are embryonic, but they are not novel. They represent a continuation of valuable developments, from which the Iraq war was an irrelevant aberration, that could quickly be revived and taken forward. They could reunite us behind the lessons learned from error and division.

The task is daunting and epic. It needs prime ministerial focus and energy. The Bush doctrine is dead, and I hope that the proposals that I have set out may form the basis not of the Bush doctrine but perhaps of a Blair doctrine—a return to a strong, independent British foreign policy, making a telling contribution in an ever more interdependent world.

2.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend on raising what is an exceedingly important subject. Never has the debate about the circumstances in which it is right and appropriate to intervene in tyrannical regimes been more important. I have some sympathy with the view that my hon. Friend has expressed—that the international community should act earlier and more firmly to assist those who are subject to oppressive regimes. I think genuinely that the terms of the global debate are changing.

The Government want to be at the forefront of that debate. As the Prime Minister made clear in his speech in Sedgefield on 5 March, Britain's role should be "to construct a consensus behind a broad agenda of justice and security and the means of enforcing it."

Before I discuss that agenda further, I feel that I must respond to some of my hon. Friend's criticisms about the decision to go to war with Iraq.

I respect my hon. Friend's integrity, and have always made clear my view that we were right to go to war, although I fully respect the right and belief of others who reached a different decision. I would not accept his arguments that the actions that we took were counterproductive or that we failed. If he does not believe me or the Government when we say that life is better for the people of Iraq today than it was under Saddam, I urge him to listen to ordinary people in Iraq, where a majority say that life is better than a year ago under Saddam, and more than 70 per cent. say that they think that it will continue to get better. That is the polling evidence, and what Government colleagues who visit Iraq find, and it is backed up by what ordinary people are saying on the ground.

My hon. Friend has also made the case that the international community's response to oppressive regimes has not evolved sufficiently. While I accept that it needs to evolve further, over the years, there has been evidence of significant change. First, political pressure has always been a powerful tool in facing up to tyranny, and it has become more so. Anyone who doubts that ought simply to witness the huge, extraordinary lobbying effort at Geneva at the moment by those nations that fear that they risk being criticised for their human rights records. When I delivered our contribution to the debate in Geneva last week, I saw that at first hand.

Within the European Union, we now build dialogue on human rights into our relations with third countries, and bring the economic and political weight of the EU to bear by linking those dialogues to wider relationships of trade and other assistance. That is absolutely right. Through NEPAD—New Partnership for Africa's Development—African countries have established a peer review mechanism to pressure each other, rightly, into better governance. The African Union is playing an increasingly confident role in enabling dialogue to resolve disputes peacefully. Such collective political action can and does shame Governments into better behaviour, opening the doors to external monitoring, and can be used by reformists and civil society within a country. International institutions such as the UN play a key role in this: setting the standards of acceptable behaviour; providing independent monitoring mechanisms as well as assistance; and finally, providing external legitimacy to successful political reforms.

Sanctions also have a role to play, which we see with regard to the situation in Burma and Zimbabwe. Increasingly, sanctions regimes are better targeted to ensure that their effects are concentrated on the leaders and regimes responsible for repression, and their sources of wealth and influence, rather than on the people suffering under such regimes.

Other forms of direct action have grown in volume and effectiveness, including governance support and reform programmes, economic adjustment, security sector reform, police training and peace support operations. The establishment, now supported by more than 60 countries, of the proliferation security initiative will help further to prevent trafficking of weapons of mass destruction and related materials through enhanced interdiction efforts, which can help us to face up to tyranny.

Let me turn to the issue of reforming the international system. We have achieved a great deal through our efforts to strengthen the international systems and structures that are needed to deliver results. I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's comments about the establishment of the International Criminal Court, which marks a new step in the long battle against impunity for the perpetrators of the most serious international crimes. I want to take this opportunity to make it very clear that we urge all states to sign up to the ICC, which we believe can be a key tool in the fight against tyranny.

In the final analysis, when we are facing up to tyranny, military action can be used, in accordance with international law, against those tyrannical regimes. For us, military action has been, and will always remain, a last resort. Over recent years, the UN has been developing its thinking, based on individual cases, on where military intervention is justified for humanitarian purposes. The Security Council can authorise the use of force in response to threats to international peace and security, breaches of the peace or acts of aggression. It has explicitly determined that widespread violations of human rights and international humanitarian law have contributed to situations threatening the peace, and mandated enforcement action in former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and East Timor. I think that most people regard that as essentially just and correct. The Security Council also supported enforcement action to return to power an elected Government that had been overthrown, such as in Sierra Leone and in Haiti. Again, I think that most people would accept those actions and propositions.

On occasions—thankfully rare—the Security Council does not authorise actions that we consider necessary. In a sense, that is the nub of some of the issues that my hon. Friend highlighted. There are no easy solutions in those circumstances. For instance, in the case of Kosovo, we had to ask ourselves how to respond when a Security Council decision could not be reached in the face of an imminent humanitarian crisis in the form of appalling ethnic cleansing the like of which we had not seen on our continent since the second world war. At that time, we made clear our view that states do have a right, in exceptional circumstances, to take military action when it is the only way to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe, and that that is the case even in the absence of explicit authorisation from the Security Council. My hon. Friend is nodding; I know that he supported that action at the time.

Since 1999, our view has been increasingly supported, although it is not universally accepted. We continue to work to build up a consensus on the circumstances in which a right to intervene applies. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made that very clear in a speech that he made in Chicago in April 1999, in which he rightly suggested the five broad guiding principles that should, in an international context, be the framework within which decisions on whether to intervene for humanitarian purposes are taken.

It is worth repeating those principles. First, we must decide whether we are sure of the case and sure that armed force is the only means of dealing with the problem. Secondly, we must assess whether we have exhausted all diplomatic options. Thirdly, on the basis of a practical assessment of the situation, we must judge whether there are military operations that we can sensibly and prudently undertake. My hon. Friend suggested that intervention should be applied universally and impartially to all states. The logic of such an argument is strong, but the benefits of intervening have to be weighed against the risk of creating a threat to peace and security. As I said, other options, such as political pressure and sanctions regimes, are available when intervention would be unwise. Fourthly, we must decide whether we are prepared for a long-term commitment once the military action is over: that is critical. Finally, we must assess whether we have national interests involved.

That speech was a major contribution to the evolution of international thinking since the end of the cold war. In 1999, we put forward similar suggested criteria to the Security Council, although they did not prosper in discussion at the time. Nevertheless, we are still advancing the case and will continue to do so. At the same time, important work is going on to ensure better action against the threat or use of genocide, most notably to create a focal point for genocide prevention within the United Nations framework.

Mr. Allen: I thank my hon. Friend for a thought-provoking speech so far. May I bring to his attention again the question of trust? The British Government, in particular, are seeking concrete and practical steps to realise some of the things that he is talking about. He alluded to the Prime Minister's Chicago speech. Not a great deal may be seen to have been achieved by the British public and the global public from that speech, good as it was. Is my hon. Friend aware that some of us want to take matters further and ensure that the Sedgefield speech is looked back on as one of the landmarks that moved our country forward in real, practical steps, so that we do not refer to it as a good speech but as something that started a lot of practical action?

Mr. Rammell: I understand my hon. Friend's point. We cannot just make speeches; we must follow things through. We are attempting to do that, but we cannot do it on our own. We must seek international consensus and support. We are taking this debate and the need for change internationally extremely seriously. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is rightly taking a lead in setting out the framework of our thinking and the challenges that the UN need to face. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is taking that agenda extremely seriously. We are continually discussing these issues and this agenda with our partners.

I have visited the UN on a number of occasions in recent months. I recently met leading members of the Secretary-General's high level panel, all with a view to pushing forward this debate and trying to engage others to support us. We have also published a Command Paper on our relations with the UN, and we shall shortly be submitting formally our views to the Secretary-General's high level panel.

The nub of the debate, given what my hon. Friend has said, is his wish to create an international framework in which unilateralism, by whatever state, does not take place. He wants to see agreed collective international action under the auspices of the UN. Ideally, those are the circumstances in which I would always want us to operate. It is not as easy as just wishing that to happen. I think that the Secretary-General got it absolutely right when he spoke to the General Assembly in September 2003:

"it is not enough to denounce unilateralism unless we also face up squarely to the concerns that make some States feel uniquely vulnerable."

It is not just a simple equation between unilateralism and internationalism. If we want the UN to be the key agency that affects and governs the decisions, it has to demonstrate that it has the collective will and political capacity to face the key challenges that are to be found in the modern world, principally international terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. In making that case we must convince those countries that are sceptical about it, at the same time, that we are prepared to take their concerns seriously—global poverty, inequality and injustice—and follow through significantly on achieving the millennium development goals. That is the other side of the bargain in taking these issues and this debate forward.

In that context, and in facing those challenges, I believe that the decision of the Secretary-General to appoint a high level panel to look at how the UN can improve its response to the broad range of threats to international peace and security has been a positive development. The panel is likely to take a broad view of the current threat to peace and security. That is surely correct. Terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, threats to the environment, AIDS, poverty and disease were not considered part of the security agenda when the charter was drafted, but they manifestly are part of the agenda and the challenge that we are now facing.

Mr. Allen: I am sorry to spring this one on my hon. Friend. I hope he will take the matter away and consider it rather than giving an answer from the Dispatch Box. Will my hon. Friend consider how we might involve Parliament in feeding ideas into the high level panel as it goes about its work? I do not know how that might best be done. It might be by way of pre-legislative scrutiny, meetings or whatever. However, it is important that all parties in the House have the opportunity to make a contribution.

Mr. Rammell: I agree with my hon. Friend. We have already been doing that in Westminster Hall and in Government time on the Floor of the House. We have initiated a debate on UN reform and enabled Members to come forward with their views. That is the right way forward. I have met the all-party group in the context of the UN and will seek to do that further.

We are facing critical challenges. The world we live in today is enormously more dangerous than it was even in the most recent past. It is critical that we face these questions, and we need all parliamentarians, the whole of civil society and the whole of the international community if we are to respond to them. In a small way, debates such as this one give us—

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Sea Harriers

1. Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): When the first Sea Harriers will be withdrawn from service. [163773]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The first of the three Sea Harrier squadrons will be withdrawn from service on 31 March 2004. It is planned to retire the second squadron in March 2005 and the final squadron in March 2006.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. His plans seem to rely on replacing the Sea Harrier with the GR7/9, yet, as many people know, that aircraft is not designed for the same purpose. It is designed to attack slow-moving tanks on land, not to defend against high-speed missiles at sea. Without the appropriate radar and missiles, how exactly is the Minister's plan going to work?

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has followed the progress of the decision. This was a balance of investment decision. In looking at the upgrade of the Harrier fleet and/or the continuation of the Sea Harrier, the cost of retaining the Sea Harrier was deemed prohibitive, and it would also have been technically difficult in terms of the upgrade programme that was envisaged. There was no certainty, having spent the money or having spent some money some way down the line, about getting the upgrade with the aircraft that he may now wish to see remaining in service. I suggest that he raise the matter with his shadow Chancellor, who envisages a cut of £1.5 billion. The cost of the upgrade is about £0.5 billion, with other whole-life costs attached. I only put the information to him; clearly, he has not been following it.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): The Government's own strategic defence review recognised in 1998 that air superiority and air defence would be essential for maritime operations, yet this week, Ministers will start removing air defence from our maritime forces, deliberately taking risks with men and ships by exposing them to air attack. The Minister knows that the GR7 is no substitute for the Sea Harrier and that there will be a serious capability gap between now and the arrival of the new carriers and the joint strike fighter, assuming that, as is planned, they are not delayed beyond 2012. Perhaps that is why HMS Ark Royal is now to be put in mothballs this month—because it cannot be protected by Sea Harriers. Even at this late hour, may I urge Ministers to keep to their original policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementaries from the Front Bench are far too long.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): That is just the Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will not be long in taking care of the Minister when the time comes.

Mr. Ingram: I will be very brief. I refer the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) a few moments ago.

Married Quarters (Policing)

2. Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What assessment he has made of the policing of service married quarters in Salisbury constituency. [163774]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): While no specific assessment has taken place of the policing of service family accommodation in Salisbury, the policing requirements at all service family accommodation, including that located in Salisbury, is kept under review by the Ministry of Defence police commander responsible for public safety. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the safety of service personnel and their dependants remains a matter of significant concern to Ministers and the Department.

Mr. Key: It ought to be of first concern to the Minister. Is he aware that, in the redeployment of the Ministry of Defence police and the cutting of their presence in the Salisbury area—only 14 MDP officers will be available to cover the Salisbury area—he is putting a new burden on the Wiltshire constabulary for the 300 or so criminal acts that require police presence every year in just the Amesbury area, and that this is no time to be cutting any of our security forces?

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of these issues, because he and I have corresponded long and hard over this matter in the past six months, but I can say to him that the divisional support group will, as he knows, be located at Larkhill. It will have 22 officers, and I am confident that it will provide the type of policing that those families expect in Salisbury.

RAF Stafford

4. Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): What consideration he has given to representations made to him on the future of RAF Stafford. [163776]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): At a recent meeting, I advised my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), who was accompanied by senior local authority representatives, that I am considering carefully all representations from areas potentially affected by the review of the air combat service support unit and will take them into account when making my decision. I expect to make a decision after the Easter recess.

Paul Farrelly: The Minister will know that RAF Stafford has a long and proud history as an important civilian and military employer in the north Staffordshire area. My granddad worked at RAF Stafford, and my cousin from Stafford joined the RAF as a pilot and flew Tornadoes in the first Gulf war. We are currently trying to attract much-needed government jobs into north Staffordshire for regeneration, so before my right hon. Friend the Minister makes his decision on RAF Stafford will he please consider carefully the demoralising effect of moving jobs not from south to north, but from north to south?

Mr. Ingram: That concern must form part of our consideration, but my hon. Friend knows that operational effectiveness is the main driver in the process, which is one reason why we have examined the distribution of those units. We fully recognise the impact on local communities of closing particular stations, but we must face up to such tough decisions in government and consider what is right in terms of operations and the balance of the arguments. Many areas of the country have given loyal support and service to the armed forces, but over the years the armed forces' presence in those areas has contracted. I will take all my hon. Friend's points into account—indeed, I am doing so.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): In considering the future basing study, of which the possible closure of RAF Stafford and, indeed, RAF Bulmer are a part, will the Minister carefully examine the capital costs, which would take a very long time to pay off, in the investment appraisal? The alternative is to leave important facilities on sites where investment has already taken place.

Mr. Ingram: I had a useful meeting about the Bulmer station with the right hon. Gentleman, where he made those points. I gave him a commitment that I would meet all local interests at each station that could be affected by the decision, and I have done just that. I am taking my time to trawl through all elements of the matter because of those stations' importance within their local communities.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) for supporting RAF Stafford. Indeed, all Staffordshire MPs—Conservative and Labour—have been united in their support. Will the Minister acknowledge that RAF Stafford is the last surviving military presence in Staffordshire's county town, that it has accepted its responsibility for tri-service working, and that it has been militarily effective? Will he make a commitment that a military presence will remain in Stafford after the end of the review in April?

Mr. Ingram: I pay tribute to the way in which my hon. Friend has campaigned with his local authority colleagues on a cross-party basis. They have made a cogent case, which must be set against the operational imperatives that I referred to earlier and the overall balance of the decisions that must be taken. I note what he says, and he made the same points when he attended the meeting that I referred to earlier. After any decision is taken, I would obviously be willing to meet interested parties again to talk through the implications.

Shoeburyness Ranges

5. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future use of the new ranges in Shoeburyness. [163777]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Shoeburyness provides a unique capability for test and evaluation activities and makes a vital contribution to national security. The ranges are included in the long-term partnering agreement that has been negotiated with Qinetiq for the delivery of a long-term test and evaluation capability to the Ministry of Defence. This agreement came into effect on 1 April 2003 and is intended to continue for 25 years.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, in consultation with Thames gateway, has just announced the expenditure of £2 million on a study of access to and the use of Shoeburyness, can the Minister give an assurance that Southend borough council and Rochford council will be fully consulted if there are any proposals for development of unused land on the new ranges?

Mr. Caplin: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance because my Department is in discussions with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about many land issues.

Balkans (British Deployment)

6. Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the work of British forces in the Balkans. [163778]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): British forces are deployed in both Bosnia and Kosovo under NATO command to provide a safe and secure environment there. They are assisting the international community in creating conditions that will support eventual self-sustaining security in the region.

The purpose of the recent deployment of NATO's operational reserve force to Kosovo is to restore calm to the province and to prevent unrest from spreading to areas outside Kosovo. The 1st Battalion, Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment is providing the core of the battalion group. UK troops will conduct routine patrolling, the guarding of sites such as the UN mission and public order duties, as tasked by commander KFOR.

Rachel Squire: Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the excellent and rapid response of our armed forces, particularly in dealing with the latest crisis in Kosovo? Does he agree that the announcement that Bowman has achieved its in-service date months ahead of schedule will be very good news for our troops in the Balkans and elsewhere, as it will improve their vital personal communications technology? Does he further agree that that is one example of where the Government have acted on lessons learned in previous Balkans operations and delivered with remarkable success?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her remarks. Dealing specifically with the Bowman development, we made it clear in the lessons learned exercise on Kosovo in 1999 that there had been shortcomings in our tactical combat radio capability. The Bowman system is designed to provide a modern, secure successor to Clansman, and I am delighted to announce that Bowman has today achieved its in-service date ahead of target.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Last week's announcement that further troops are to be sent to Kosovo only adds to the overstretch that our military already face. Can the Secretary of State give an assurance that he will look carefully at the tasks that our armed forces are expected to undertake throughout the world to ensure that that overstretch is not added to; otherwise, a time will come when it bursts completely, which would be unacceptable?

Mr. Hoon: First, there is no overstretch. Secondly, this deployment does not add to any apparent overstretch, not least because the troops that were sent were held at very short notice. High-readiness forces are available there for precisely this kind of deployment, as the hon. Gentleman should know.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's remarks about progress in Bosnia, and I am sure that we all welcome the improvement in its political and security situation. However, can he give any reasons why similar progress is not being made in Kosovo? Perhaps one reason is that NATO has not placed as much emphasis on the political situation as it should. Will my right hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Hoon: I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend's conclusions. One difference between the two situations may be owing to no more than the passage of time. In both places, there were appalling incidents involving attacks on rival ethnic communities, but in Bosnia more time has passed and some of the wounds have healed, whereas in Kosovo, as we saw last week, those wounds are still very painful to the two communities. That is not meant in any way to suggest to my hon. Friend that we should not proceed in Bosnia and in Kosovo with a political and constitutional settlement that allows all the communities in the Balkans to live peacefully together.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The Secretary of State will know that at the end of the year SFOR hands over to the EU in the Balkans. Can he tell us under whose command British troops will then fall—that of the EU or of those NATO forces remaining?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is usually slightly more precise than his question would suggest. As he will be aware, there has not yet been a decision by NATO to take the responsibility and to pass it across to an EU operation. The United Kingdom has indicated that, were that to happen, it would be willing to lead such an EU operation. As the arrangements develop and are decided, I will of course inform the House about the circumstances.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend say why it is proving so difficult to arrest General Mladic and Radovan Karadzic?

Mr. Hoon: The short answer to that is that they are not telling us where they are. I assure my hon. Friend and the House that determined efforts are being made, and will continue to be made, to bring both those men to justice.

Warship Procurement

7. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the progress of the procurement of new warships for the Royal Navy. [163779]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence has embarked on the largest procurement programme of new ships for the Royal Navy in many years, including orders for six Type 45 destroyers, three Astute class submarines and four landing ships dock, auxiliary.

Future plans include the purchase of two new aircraft carriers, further orders of Type 45 destroyers and Astute class submarines, the joint casualty treatment ship, and the progressive replacement of existing Royal Fleet Auxiliary Service vessels through the military afloat reach and sustainability project.

Mr. Luff: I am grateful for that detailed reply, but is the Minister confident that the planned pattern of future warship procurement and development remains appropriate in the light of increasingly asymmetrical, non-state warfare?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, but everything must be kept under review.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool) (Lab): Alongside his plans for procurement, will my right hon. Friend disclose those for decommissioning? In particular, will he state what is intended for HMS Intrepid? Will it be scrapped in the UK as a matter of Government policy, and will that policy apply to all other Navy vessels in the future?

Mr. Ingram: I understand my right hon. Friend's interest and the campaign in which he has become involved. I appreciate the strength and the merits of his case in terms of the total fleet—merchant and naval—that requires decommissioning in the years ahead. The best that I can offer is to hold a meeting with him and any interested parties to talk through his proposal so that it could help us to reach a decision on the matter.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): How can the Minister reconcile paying off four Type 42 frigates as surplus to requirements? If they are no longer required, why was HMS Nottingham, which is about to emerge from a £26 million refit, brought all the way back from Australia?

Mr. Ingram: If I read the comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) correctly, he suggested that, in one sense, we should not have any such ships because the asymmetrical threat means that we do not need that defence element. On the other hand, the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) says that we should keep everything. We cannot live in such a world. We must judge what is appropriate in the light of future threats and make appropriate decisions at the right time. What happens to specific ships therefore becomes a matter of military assessment and judgment about what the size of the fleet should be, set against the new procurements that are coming on stream, to ensure that we have a significant naval force—indeed, perhaps the second biggest and best in the world.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): My right hon. Friend doubtless recalls the warm welcome given to the Government's warship building programmes in the areas that can reasonably expect to play a part in constructing the new vessels, such as my constituency and others on the River Clyde. He will also know that media speculation in recent weeks has added some uncertainty to that role, especially in relation to the aircraft carrier programme. Will he restate firmly the Government's commitment to proceed with the warship building programme in its entirety and thus reassure workers in Greenock and Inverclyde and elsewhere that the Government's commitment to British shipbuilding is as strong as ever?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend is another intrepid campaigner, not only on behalf of his area but of shipbuilding throughout the United Kingdom. We have a firm commitment to retaining design and construction in the UK shipbuilding industry. That is why the RAND report was commissioned. Its purpose is to examine how best we can position the UK shipbuilding industry to meet the growing demand that I outlined in my earlier answer. It will conclude shortly, and the findings will be published, with commercially sensitive information taken out. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for continuing to push for such an important industry.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Will the Minister confirm that, such is the uncertainty that surrounds the future carrier programme, it is now said that the Ministry of Defence will become the prime contractor? Is he aware that such a situation flies in the face of all previous experience and advice? How does he intend to proceed with the contract? What are the timing implications as a result of the disastrous way in which the matter is being tackled?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman appears to want to talk down all the significant projects. We are considering a major procurement. Of course, when he was doing my job, he had a history of cutting and slashing defence expenditure. We have announced the largest shipbuilding programme for many years—I thought that he would welcome that.

On aircraft carriers, the hon. Gentleman should know that stage three of the assessment is due to continue until spring. It is therefore reaching a conclusion. Rather than respond to press speculation, why does he not wait for the outcome? Work on the design is progressing and all the parties are actively engaged in discussions on that alliance strategy. That is the important way forward, as is the need to get it right, to keep to budget and, most important, to ensure that we get the necessary capability for the Royal Navy.

British Infantry

8. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): What assessment he has made of the adequacy and availability of British infantry to respond to additional urgent deployments. [163780]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): A number of British infantry units are routinely held in reserve, at very high readiness to deploy. That ensures that the Army always has prepared troops available to respond to additional urgent deployments. The effectiveness of those arrangements was demonstrated by our rapid response to the recent troubles in Kosovo. The spearhead land element was deployed to theatre there in less than 24 hours and undertook its first patrol the very next day.

Mr. Boswell: While I agree with the Secretary of State that it was very welcome that the spearhead battalion was able to get to Kosovo so quickly and to be so effective, does he not agree that serious issues could arise in the slightly longer term in relation to the relief and rotation of forces, to resupply and, ultimately, to the ability to retain forces in the service under their present working conditions? Is not the reality that the thin red line of the British infantry has been stretched for a considerable time, and has in effect been running itself on red?

Mr. Hoon: Of course, I answered that question a few moments ago, but let me explain to the hon. Gentleman that this deployment of operational reserves is likely to be in theatre only for a matter of weeks, as I said to the House last week. Therefore none of the resupply or replacement issues that he mentioned will arise in this case.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The Secretary of State referred to the increasing number of commitments that the armed forces face around the world. Does he agree that retention is of major importance, that the strength of the Army is still below what it should be, and that the Government should therefore be considering ways of increasing the number of soldiers? As his colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin), will know, one way of doing that would be to reinstate the 3rd Battalion, Royal Anglian Regiment, which would go a long way towards redressing the shortfall.

Mr. Hoon: I certainly admire the hon. Gentleman's persistence. I seem to recall that he asked precisely the same question at the previous Defence questions. He is right to emphasise the importance of retention and recruitment, and I am pleased to be able to tell the House that we have seen a creditable improvement in performance in both those areas over the last year. With the hon. Gentleman's help and encouragement, that will no doubt continue.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that I have a very military constituency. Indeed, his junior Minister, the Under-Secretary, visited Army cadets there last Thursday. Does the Secretary of State recognise the great concern among the many service families in my constituency that those deployed to Iraq did not have the appropriate kit? Indeed, I am getting many letters from those families. Can he reassure them that in any future deployments of infantry, the kit will be there at the same time as the men?

Mr. Hoon: The kit was in theatre, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will know, as he will have read the National Audit Office report on the subject. I am sure that, when he responds to constituents expressing their understandable concerns, he will put those concerns into context, because it is clear from a series of reports on the deployment that, overall, this was an outstanding success, including—as the NAO noted—an outstanding logistical success. There were, however, deficiencies that must be addressed, and I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that they will be.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): In respect of the Secretary of State's earlier answer, the spearhead battalion is held specifically for the kind of task in Kosovo that he described. Will he accept the view that the Chief of the Defence Staff made quite plain last week to the Defence Committee that the overstretch currently being experienced by the armed forces as they undertake their extremely onerous task is such that, in these dangerous times, we would not be able to mount a similar operation to Telic until approaching the end of the decade?

Mr. Hoon: To be fair, as the hon. Gentleman usually is, the CDS went on to say that it would be possible to mount such an operation if we were to redeploy forces from other obligations and operations. That has always been the case, and it remains so.

Mr. Soames: But given the scale and size of the obligations, do not the observations of the CDS reveal in the starkest terms the folly of cutting the trained strength of the armed forces from 194,600 to 182,800? That is a cut of 12,000 over seven years, the equivalent of nearly 15 infantry battalions.

Mr. Hoon: I will not embarrass the hon. Gentleman by telling him the number of cuts made in the trained strength when he was the armed forces Minister, but the margin was rather larger than the one he has just set out. I know that that is embarrassingly inconvenient for him, but the answer he gave when he was asked about that issue remains valid today, which is that assessments are made on a military basis of the requirement for forces in the light of the overall capabilities and equipment available to our armed forces at the time. That is the answer he gave, and I am delighted to repeat it.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend considered forming a Commonwealth regiment to ease the pressure? Is not that, or increasing the number of Gurkhas, a way forward on returning to the strengths of previous years?

Mr. Hoon: As my hon. Friend will be aware, there is already significant recruitment from the Commonwealth. We have given this matter some consideration, but I am not necessarily sure that it is appropriate to try to replicate the arrangements under which Gurkhas are recruited to Britain's armed forces. I am content that elements from the Commonwealth join a variety of regiments and add their particular contribution in a number of different ways. That seems to me to be the best way forward.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that for our armed forces to maintain their cutting edge, those in the infantry, like those in other parts of the services, must have two things: a lifestyle that their families can put up with in the long run and regular, high-intensity exercises? What is the tour interval for infantry battalions and what major exercises are planned to keep those excellent skills well honed over the next year?

Mr. Hoon: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that list today, but I can write to him with all those details. I am sure he is aware from his excellent contacts in the armed forces that proper leave was provided—for example, after the deployment to Iraq. That continues to be the case. Obviously, it is important that we maintain a proper balance between leave entitlement and regular high-intensity exercises as well as deployment on operations of the kind that have been so successful in Iraq. That balance must be continued if we are to retain the right people in our armed forces.

D-day Anniversary

9. Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): If he will make a statement on recent progress with plans to celebrate the 60th anniversary of D-day. [163781]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I am confident that the organisation we have in place will ensure that the events in Normandy are properly organised, carefully planned and appropriate for the occasion.

At the last Defence Question Time on 1 March, my hon. Friend asked about "Heroes Return". That was followed up by a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), whom I see in his place, on Irish citizens who served in the British armed forces during the second world war. I took the issues raised very seriously and undertook to investigate. Consequently, I am pleased to inform the House that in recognition of the unique circumstances that set Ireland apart from other countries, the Ministry of Defence and the national lottery's New Opportunities Fund have put in place special arrangements with the Royal British Legion to allow Irish veterans who volunteered for service in the British armed forces and are now resident in the Republic of Ireland to be included in "Heroes Return". I am sure that the whole House welcomes that outcome.

Shona McIsaac: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for that news. I know that many families will appreciate being able to travel back for the celebrations.

Will my hon. Friend take a little time to read the excellent coverage of "Heroes Return" and the D-day celebrations in the Scunthorpe Evening Telegraph? I have the cuttings here for him if he wants to read them. The paper has been following former seaman Arnie Marshall in getting his money and the journey he will make back to Normandy. Will he wish Mr. Marshall well and praise the local newspapers that have been giving the initiative such excellent coverage?

Mr. Caplin: I certainly hope that Mr. Marshall enjoys his return to Normandy, which I am sure will bring back good memories for him. I am pleased to hear about the coverage of the D-day events and "Heroes Return" in the Scunthorpe Evening Telegraph, which, I have to say, has not been high on my reading list recently. However, I detect that my hon. Friend will ensure that I read it in future.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): The Minister will know that an estimated 10,000 British Normandy veterans survive 60 years after the event. When I secured an Adjournment debate on 25 February, it was estimated that about 3,000 of those had already made plans to visit Normandy in June. Since then, how many more have applied or expressed an interest in visiting the Normandy beaches? Will the Minister assure the House that they will have been given full information about the one-year passports available and how to claim, for part of their expenses at least, on the New Opportunities Fund?

Mr. Caplin: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman on the last two points. At the last Defence questions, I also gave the freephone number for the Veterans Agency, which will handle calls and deal with any issues that veterans have. We think that the number travelling to Normandy that weekend will be between 5,000 and 10,000. That figure is likely to include carers and members of the families who will be accompanying veterans.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that my constituency was slightly ahead of the game on the heritage lottery fund, led by the sterling work of Ernie Innes, who sadly died recently. Will he place on record his condolences and thanks for the sterling work done by people such as Ernie, who give up so much of their time as volunteers, and set out what a strong example he was for many young people in constituencies such as mine, up and down the country?

Mr. Caplin: I had the privilege of visiting Chester earlier in the year, and I know of the work of the Chester and Wirral branch of the Normandy Veterans Association, which Mr. Innes founded. I pay tribute to his work and send the whole House's condolences to Mrs. Innes and her family at this difficult time. Certainly, "Heroes Return" is about bringing veterans and young people together to preserve the history of what happened in 1944 and 1945 and to pass on the baton of remembrance to future generations.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I thank the Minister for his announcement in relation to the Irish veterans. In relation to what he has done today, I would use the words of Tim Healy, a famous former Member of the House, who said:

"so long as water runs and grass is green Irishmen will always be grateful".

It also allows us to do two things. One is to reinforce the important bilateral relationship with the Irish Republic—but, most importantly, it allows us to recognise that the 32 counties of Ireland are still a rich and proud reservoir of servicemen in our British armed forces today, which we must celebrate, welcome and do everything we can to encourage, bearing in mind particularly the sacrifice of one very brave Irish Guardsman in the recent Iraqi conflict.

Mr. Caplin: I thank my hon. Friend for his sterling efforts on this matter. He raised the issue on 1 March, and he has constantly badgered me and other Ministers to make sure that we came to some conclusion. I am glad that he is pleased with the eventual outcome.

Afghanistan

10. Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the role of the armed forces in Afghanistan. [163782]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The United Kingdom has about 460 personnel deployed to Afghanistan. About 360 of those are serving with the international security assistance force—ISAF—which is assisting the Afghan transitional authority to maintain security in Kabul. The remainder are serving with the US-led coalition, including 90 deployed to the provincial reconstruction team in Mazar-e-Sharif. The team aims to assist in extending the authority of the Afghan Government in northern Afghanistan, to facilitate security sector reform and to create the conditions necessary to assist reconstruction.

Kali Mountford: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. I am sure that the whole House recognises the important work done by our forces in Kabul and in ISAF. Will he update the House further on the work of provincial reconstruction teams, and in particular on the protection of local personnel in elections and the protection of humanitarian aid? Is it not important that that work continues until local security and police forces are fully operational?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her question. The United Kingdom Government strongly support the need further to expand the international security assistance force beyond Kabul, and particularly to demonstrate our concern that the security situation, especially in the south, should not deteriorate. We therefore believe that NATO's plan for ISAF progressively to assume control of groups of regional PRTs presents the best way forward for security across the country. For that reason, the United Kingdom has indicated its willingness to build on the success of our provincial reconstruction team by, together with partner nations, playing a leading role in the expansion of ISAF, particularly, in the first place, into northern Afghanistan.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I think that everyone wants to celebrate the professionalism of the British forces who have been working in Afghanistan. Nevertheless, a strategy that would apparently bring peace and security to the area around Kabul while allowing the return of the warlords and drug growers and, indeed, the re-formation of the Taliban throughout the vast majority of Afghanistan surely raises more questions than it answers. When will we actually see the war that was started in Afghanistan finished?

Mr. Hoon: As I just said, that is not the strategy. We are seeking to extend the impact of ISAF beyond Kabul, to other parts of Afghanistan. The provincial reconstruction teams are already achieving that, but we recognise the need to expand their number and range of activities.

I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's description of Afghanistan. Certainly there are security problems in the south, but elsewhere the security arrangements are very good. People are able to continue their ordinary way of life quite satisfactorily.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): In answering this and earlier questions, the Secretary of State has rightly praised the role of our armed forces in Afghanistan, the Balkans and Iraq. I fear, however, that servicemen in Afghanistan and their families would have been amazed to hear what I imagine to have been an off-the-cuff comment from him. His statement that there is no overstretch in the armed forces flies in the face of all the evidence—the evidence of every previous Chief of the Defence Staff, most retired serving members of the armed forces and, indeed, those currently serving. What does he say to servicemen in Afghanistan and their families who rightly suggest that there is overstretch, and that it is getting worse?

Mr. Hoon: Perhaps the key indicator of overstretch, in the past at any rate, has been the retention rate. The hon. Gentleman is right: if there is significant overstretch, one of the consequences is that people believe they are no longer valued and leave the armed forces. The position today is the reverse, however. More people are staying for longer, essentially because they appreciate the conditions under which Her Majesty's armed forces are operating and the challenge with which they are being presented.

Formation Training Cycle

11. Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): If he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the formation training cycle. [163783]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The formation readiness cycle is the means by which the Army prepares its six non-specialist brigades to meet commitments. It has served the Army well, giving the flexibility to deliver appropriately trained and prepared units to meet a variety of commitments, in accordance with the aims of the strategic defence review.

As we explained in the recent White Paper, we are examining possible changes to the current and future capabilities of the armed forces and supporting infrastructure that are required to deliver a network-enabled capability. Part of this work will be to consider the effect that those changes will have on the formation readiness cycle.

Mr. Blunt: The truth is that the formation readiness and training cycle has not been able to work because the Government have taken the Army into war four times in the past five years. Does the Minister really stand by the Secretary of State's comment that there is no overstretch? Is not the truth that there is a huge hollowing out of training in the armed forces because the formation training cycle cannot work? That is why the Chief of the Defence Staff says that we will not be ready to man Telic again until 2008–09.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman has raised an interesting point, which was covered in my reply. We need to examine the current operation of the formation readiness cycle to establish whether it is robust and meets the needs of the armed forces, and what should take its place if that is not the case. It is important for the whole training cycle, along with preparedness and deployability of forces, to accord with the proposed force restructuring. That will not happen overnight; it must be planned in the context of the changed force structure and the various requirements that will then confront us internationally and at home.

I take on board what the hon. Gentleman has said, although I do not necessarily accept all of it. I hope that my explanation has been sufficiently detailed.

Troop Deployments

12. Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the future deployment of UK troops stationed in Germany. [163784]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The 4th Armoured Brigade, currently based in Germany, has been earmarked for future deployment in Iraq, in November 2004, as part of Operation Telic. In addition, 26 Regiment Royal Artillery will deploy to Cyprus in September 2004. A number of other supporting units based in Germany are likely to deploy to Bosnia, Kosovo, Iraq and Northern Ireland in the course of the next 18 months.

Jane Griffiths: Norman Mailer once wrote a book called "Why are we in Vietnam?", and I have been tempted to ask the Minister, why are we in Germany? However, I welcome his answer that there is to be more rational deployment, as I would describe it. When will the targets for redeployment finally be met, and when will the last British soldier leave Germany?

Mr. Ingram: There are a number of questions involved, and the issue of why we are in Germany is fundamentally different from that in Norman Mailer's book, "Why are we in Vietnam?" I suggest that Europe is somewhat different from the situation that Norman Mailer was looking at. We have a considerable amount of infrastructure in Germany, as does the US, and we have very good relationships with our German allies. My hon. Friend asks when the last troops will leave Germany, but I do not think that I can give her an answer. We have met the commitment laid down in the strategic defence review to withdraw certain posts—that is, a reduction of 2,100 posts by 2005. That target has been met, with the exception of the return of two Royal Tank regiments, involving 600 personnel, who are due to return in the third quarter of 2005, when they will be based in Tidworth. The delay in their transfer is due to the fact that the required living accommodation is not yet ready.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): If the Secretary of State is right that there is no overstretch in the Army, why is it that the tour interval for Army infantry battalions in Germany, which was two years in the mid-1990s, is now down to nine months on average, and six months for some, including the 1st Battalion Irish Guards? They returned from Iraq, attended the state opening of Parliament, and were out in Northern Ireland a matter of months later.

Mr. Ingram: The answer is that those troops have been busy. We would not deny that fact, and that has put pressure on them. It has certainly put pressure on certain key enabler functions—[Interruption.] I notice the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) shouting that there has been overstretch. However, it might be worth while examining some of the decisions that he took when he was Minister for the armed forces, and some of the problems that we are now having to correct.

Territorial Army

13. Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): How many Territorial Army personnel are members of civil contingency reaction forces. [163785]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): There are 14 civil contingency reaction forces, each with a complement of 500 Territorial Army personnel. There are therefore 7,000 Territorial Army personnel who are members of the civil contingency reaction forces at any one time.

Mr. Wiggin: If the armed forces are not overstretched, I do not understand why civil contingency reaction force troops are serving abroad when, I presume, they are supposed to be here to react to any civil contingencies. How can it possibly be the case, as I read in The Sunday Telegraph, that Private Kitulagoda, who was tragically killed in Kabul on 28 January, was a member of a CCRF?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, he was a member. We recognise the circumstances of that tragic death and pay tribute to him for his sacrifice, and also to his family for what they have had to cope with. However, the hon. Gentleman misses the point— Members of the CCRF units are also Territorials and are expected to carry out their normal Territorial functions. They are not dedicated wholly to CCRF work. About 852 members of those units have at present been deployed to other duties and backfill has taken place, but we are satisfied that if there were a requirement to call out those units they would be fully manned.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Is it not true that many Territorials are serving us very bravely in Afghanistan and Iraq, and are suffering financially in doing so? When is the Minister going to do something about that?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has been looking at that issue and he hopes to announce some progress on it in the autumn.

Budget (Armed Forces)

14. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on the impact on the armed forces of the Budget statement on 17 March. [163786]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I welcome the comments of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement to the House on 17 March. His announcement of a further real-terms increase in defence spending reflects the Government's commitment to further investment in strong defence and to the continued modernisation of our armed forces.

Miss McIntosh: By how much does the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to increase spending on the armed forces? What proportion of that will go towards medical cover for the services, so that my constituents will not have to seek private medical cover in order to discover whether they have a medical condition?

Mr. Hoon: Obviously, the amount of the increase that the Chancellor proposes will be decided through the normal process of discussions between him and the Departments, before he makes an announcement in July. However, as my hon. Friends know, that is in stark contrast to the Conservatives, who, in the unlikely event that they were elected, would cut defence spending in real terms. Indeed, they have made an announcement to that effect. Given that, as we all recognise, the armed forces are busy—they are engaged around the world and have to provide their own medical cover—it is astonishing that the Conservatives should propose to cut in real terms the amount spent on defence.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity, in the context of the Budget, to confirm that there will be no negative impacts on the armed forces pension scheme, which is currently being updated? Is the Ministry of Defence undertaking, or has it completed, a study of the scheme's local economic impact, and in particular the impact of early retirement provisions in areas of significant military population, such as Moray?

Mr. Hoon: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, a Bill dealing with modernisation of the armed forces pension arrangements is currently going through the House, and he will have the same opportunity as other Members to make a contribution to it. However, I can assure him and the rest of the House that this legislation is designed to improve the terms and conditions of the great majority of those on active service.

Iraq

15. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What assessment he has made of when all British troops will be withdrawn from Iraq. [163787]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Our contribution to the multinational force in Iraq will continue for as long as the Iraqis wish, and until the Iraqis themselves are able to take responsibility for their own security. Changes in force levels will depend on the progress made in achieving our objective, not on arbitrary targets for force reductions.

Mr. Robathan: We know that our troops are doing an excellent job and we all pay tribute to them for that, but it looks like a pretty long-standing commitment. Among others, my hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) have spoken this afternoon of overstretch in the armed forces; moreover, there is no training cycle and the Territorial Army is being cut. If there is overstretch, does the Secretary of State recognise that we need either to cut commitments or to have more troops? Will he consider raising a couple of extra battalions, because that is what is needed in the current climate? Will he not simply keep saying that the Army is "busy", which seems to be his excuse?

Mr. Hoon: Fortunately, I do not recognise the hon. Gentleman's description of our armed forces. It is simply not the case that no training is taking place; indeed, I recently saw soldiers busily engaged in training on Salisbury plain. If he examines the Army's activities throughout the country, he will see that it is busy preparing operations that soldiers are very successfully conducting.

International Terrorism

16. Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): What role the armed forces are playing in combating the threat of international terrorism. [163788]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The new chapter to the strategic defence review and the defence White Paper entitled "Delivering Security in a Changing World" set out the significant contributions that the armed forces can make to how the Government deal with international terrorism. These contributions range from defence diplomacy and stabilisation operations in tackling the conditions that promote terrorism to large-scale combat operations such as those in Afghanistan, which destroyed al-Qaeda's training camps and disrupted its leadership. They also include assisting other nations in developing their capacity to tackle terrorism.

Mr. Borrow: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. In the light of the tragic events in Madrid, what steps is he taking to ensure effective co-operation by armed forces across Europe to combat terrorism?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that, in a few moments, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be explaining to the House the decisions taken at the European Council to improve co-operation and co-ordination. I know that that includes the appointment of an official with the specific job of ensuring greater and more effective co-operation between the Governments of the European Union.

Iraq

17. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): How many Ministry of Defence personnel are serving in Iraq. [163789]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): There were 8,827 members of the United Kingdom armed forces and 67 Ministry of Defence civilian personnel serving in Iraq on 21 March 2004.

Bob Spink: We are seeing on the TV—even now—British troops under attack in Iraq. It is clear that they responded without firing a single bullet, demonstrating the superb professionalism and expertise, not to mention the great courage, of our armed services. Notwithstanding the obvious overstretch from which we are suffering, we must keep our nerve. Will the Secretary of State resist any siren voices to remove troops early from Iraq, which would threaten both that country's longer-term stability and the development of a democratic solution for the whole region?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's observation that British troops are doing a superb job. This morning's incident was a typical example of the sort of incident with which British forces have to deal—not so much terrorist activities as maintaining law and order in the south. Our forces were removing squatters from a local government building that was required for other purposes. Members may have seen the television pictures showing the reaction to that. Our forces are providing an essential contribution to law and order in the southern part of Iraq, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his commitment to them.

Redundant Land

19. Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the scope for sale by the services of redundant land. [163791]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): The Ministry of Defence continually reviews the size and location of the sites on which it operates and disposes of any surplus assets as soon as practically possible. Indeed, in the past five years the Department has generated disposal receipts totalling about £1 billion. Further work is now under way to examine the scope for consolidating defence activity at a smaller number of more densely utilised locations, in order to achieve the optimum use of land and facilities. No decisions have been reached and each proposal emerging from this work will be subject to full consultation.

Paul Flynn: The Norwegian defence department is on a standstill budget and intends to expand its valuable work in peacekeeping and providing winter training facilities for many forces, including our own, by getting rid of a third of the land it occupies. That will provide a huge sum and put the land to more useful and profitable purposes. No Government Member would want to support the totally irresponsible policy of the Conservatives to have a standstill defence budget, but could we not emulate the Norwegians by finding some land that could be sold for the benefit of the environment and other services that require extra financing?

Mr. Caplin: I can assure my hon. Friend that we take our commitment to the environment very seriously indeed. I certainly recognise the points that he makes in respect of land sales and I will take them into account as we consider the review that is under way.

Eurofighter

20. Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the number of Eurofighters the RAF will purchase. [163792]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The United Kingdom remains committed to the Typhoon programme. Fifty-five aircraft are being delivered to the RAF under the tranche one contract. We are in the process of negotiating with partner nations and industry a sound contractual basis for the second tranche of 89 aircraft. I hope that we will be in a position to place an order as soon as possible.

Chris Grayling: The Minister will be aware of anxieties within the RAF that, during a period of pressure and busyness for the armed forces, it will be the service to bear the brunt of any future cuts. Can the Minister give an assurance that the Typhoon Eurofighter programme is sacrosanct and that the number of aircraft eventually ordered and delivered will be the originally envisaged total?

Mr. Ingram: We are firmly committed to that. Negotiations have been proceeding with such intensity—to get the capability into service as soon as possible, and to ensure that we secure the right price. Tough negotiations are going on with the providers of the aircraft. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman would expect anything different from the Government on that.

Kosovo

21. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): If he will make a statement on the current situation in Kosovo. [163793]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The situation in Kosovo is relatively stable after the violent outbreaks of last week. The UK fully supports NATO's response to the situation and calls on all parties to reject violence as we continue to build a peaceful, stable Kosovo.

Mr. Randall: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. Has he had any more intelligence about, or an assessment of, whether the violence instigated by the Albanians was spontaneous or co-ordinated beforehand?

Mr. Hoon: As I indicated to the House on Thursday in the defence debate, there is no specific evidence that the violence was co-ordinated or planned, but it suggests underlying tension between the two communities. Certainly, some organisations were ready and willing to take advantage of the tension, and that is something that we deprecate. It is important that we continue to take effective action against those organisations that would seek to undermine our efforts to promote constitutional and political settlement in Kosovo.

European Council/Libya

3.30 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the European Council that I attended in Brussels on 25 and 26 March. I wish to pay tribute to the excellent organisation and chairmanship of the Irish presidency and of the Taoiseach, Bertie Ahern, in particular.

We met in the aftermath of the bomb attacks in Spain. We expressed our sympathy and solidarity with the Government and people of Spain. Co-operation in the fight against terrorism in Europe was stepped up after 11 September 2001 with the establishment of joint investigation teams, the freezing of terrorists' assets, the establishment of the European arrest warrant and a number of measures of co-operation with the United States and other countries. However, we recognised that not nearly enough had been done, especially on implementation of agreements, the provision of information to Europol and co-operation with third countries.

At this European Council we set deadlines for the implementation of EU measures. We set out further measures on counter-terrorist legislation in all member states: confiscation of crime-related proceeds, creating a comprehensive database of forensic material, strengthening border controls, better intelligence sharing, transport security, and a number of other matters that are listed in the text that we adopted at the Council. We have appointed a single person to co-ordinate the Union's work in that area and are establishing a new counter-terrorism intelligence assessment cell so that, combined with effective police co-operation through Europol and co-operation among prosecuting authorities via Eurojust, we will have the means of assessing intelligence.

I also briefed my colleagues in the European Council on my visit earlier on 25 March to Libya. I made clear to Colonel Gaddafi our support for Libya's decision to abandon voluntarily its weapons of mass destruction programmes, and our welcome for the full and transparent co-operation that Libya has subsequently given. Libya's actions in the past have caused grief and pain to many individuals and families, which we cannot forget. I raised the matters of Lockerbie and WPC Fletcher with Colonel Gaddafi, stressing the importance of the forthcoming visit to Libya by the Metropolitan police team investigating WPC Fletcher's murder. We shall stay in close touch with the families in both cases. If change in Libya is real, we should support it. It is the beginning of a process, and we should take it step by step, but I believe that a Libya free of weapons of mass destruction and with no links to terrorism is overwhelmingly in our interest and that it is right to pursue that dialogue—and we will.

What has happened over the past few weeks has reinforced the determination of all member Governments to equip a Union of 25 member states to be able to operate efficiently and effectively. As hon. Members will see from the conclusions, the Council took substantive decisions on growth, employment, research and development and on how to equip our citizens with the education, training and access to lifelong learning that are vital if Europe is to maintain its competitive edge. It is already clear that in a Europe of 25, and then of 28, decision making cannot remain as it is. The result would be paralysis of Europe and an inability to make progress in vital areas of co-operation that are emphatically in the British national interest. We need to be better able to set priorities, pass simpler laws, and have a completely different system for the day-to-day running of the European Union. That includes Governments setting the strategic direction in the European Council with a full-time chairman of the Council, chosen by Governments, to take forward that programme.

In almost every field—job creation, sustainable development, the environment, the fight against terrorism, illegal immigration and organised crime—we need to work together as one in the European Union. That is what the constitutional treaty is about and we shall seek to negotiate it to a successful conclusion under the Irish presidency. Britain will ensure that we keep control over our tax and social security systems, over the future of the UK abatement, over our own criminal justice system and over defence and foreign policy, as we said we would. Provided we do so, this treaty is right for Europe and right for Britain because, in today's world, particularly after the events of recent months, Europe needs to work more effectively to protect and enhance the lives of its people.

The European Council gave its continued strong support to the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to bring about a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus problem. This is a historic opportunity to end the long division of the island and we urge all the parties to seize it.

The European Council also welcomed the recent positive political developments in Iraq and the UN Secretary-General's acceptance of the Iraqi governing council's invitation to help. It condemned the recent terrorist attacks in Iraq, which had as their aim maximising the number of civilian casualties. The European Council also expressed grave concern over the situation in the middle east.

The European Council strongly condemned the recent ethnically motivated violence in Kosovo. All leaders locally must now take responsibility for the situation to ensure that there is no repetition.

By negotiating within the European Union, we have succeeded in establishing common policies to deal with terrorism, crime and illegal immigration. We are taking forward a programme of economic reform—long overdue. We have a common European stance to deal with the challenge of climate change. Last year, in the context of the World Trade Organisation negotiations, we achieved the biggest ever reform of the common agricultural policy—not enough, but a substantial step forward. We are developing a common foreign and security policy to tackle the common global threats that we face. Our security, stability and prosperity depend on our successful membership of the European Union. Under this Government, it will not be put at risk.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I associate Conservative Members with the words in the European Union communiqué expressing sympathy and solidarity with the victims of the terrorist attacks in Madrid, their families and the Spanish people?

[Mr. Michael Howard]

We welcome the improved relations that both the British Government and the United States Administration have established with Libya, and of course we welcome the new attitude shown by Libya in giving up acts of terror and weapons of mass destruction. There are differing views about dealing with Colonel Gaddafi, and we have to handle these matters with sensitivity and care. Does the Prime Minister still think it was right to describe Colonel Gaddafi as "courageous"?

We welcome also the practical measures that the European Union is taking to combat the threat of terrorism. Those measures include the appointment of a counter-terrorism co-ordinator. If it is right to have one figure co-ordinating the fight against terrorism at the European level, why is not the same true nationally? May I urge the Prime Minister to look again at the need for a Minister for homeland security?

Are there not important lessons to be learned from the agreement that has been reached on co-operation in the war against terrorism? Regardless of whether one agrees with each and every item, is not that an example of the way in which the countries of Europe can co-operate and work together to meet an urgent threat without constitutional change and without the need for a majority to impose its views on a minority?

The Prime Minister himself once agreed that there was no need for a constitution. At the start of that process he said that the British way for Europe was not for a "single, legally binding document called a Constitution", so why does he now support a constitution that would give the European Union many of the attributes and trappings of statehood—a President, a Foreign Minister and a new legal status? Why did he change his mind?

The Prime Minister once agreed that the constitution was not essential for enlargement. In December, he said that "this is not constitutionally necessary in order for enlargement to take place", yet now he says that it is essential for enlargement. Why did he change his mind?

The Prime Minister once said:

"We have also ruled out other potentially damaging proposals. For example, others wanted to give the European Union explicit legal personality across all the pillars of the treaty. At our insistence, that was removed."—[Official Report, 18 June 1997; Vol. 296, c. 314.]

But in the draft constitution that provision is back, meaning that the EU would have legal status on measures on criminal justice and immigration. Why did the Prime Minister change his mind?

The Prime Minister once said,

"Our case is that"

the charter of fundamental rights

"should not have legal status, and we do not intend it to. We will have to fight that case."—[Official Report, 11 December 2000; Vol. 359, c. 354.]

In the draft constitution, however, the charter will be incorporated into EU law. Why did he change his mind? He once said that there was

"no proposal, no desire or decision for a separate European military planning capability", then he agreed it. Why did he change his mind on that?

Just last December, the Prime Minister told the House:

"If it proceeds on the basis outlined by Prime Minister Berlusconi . . . criminal law will . . . remain the province of the nation-state—namely, subject to decision-making by unanimity".—[Official Report, 15 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 1320.]

Now, his spokesman says that there is "wiggle room", and his Minister for Europe says that Britain might look favourably on a common European arrest system.

Why did the Prime Minister change his mind on that?

As for timing, in December the Prime Minister's spokesman said that there "wasn't any great urgency", but now the Prime Minister wants ratification as soon as possible. Why did he change his mind on that? Could it, by chance, be connected with his desire to bounce Britain into the constitution before the general election? Nearly a decade ago, he promised:

"I will never allow this country to be isolated . . . in Europe."

Ten years later, we know what he meant by that: he meant never leading, always following others on Europe.

Last week, the Prime Minister said that there was "widespread concern about the future of the UK's fishing industry".

What a surprise! There is indeed widespread concern—and there has been for many years now. The question is, why has the Prime Minister not done anything about it? Last week, he said:

"I want the UK to give a lead in reforming the Common Fisheries Policy—by pushing the European Union further down the path of managing fish stocks on a regional level".

The constitution does indeed change the basis of the common fisheries policy—it reinforces the Commission's role. Why did the Prime Minister not take advantage of the opportunity available to him when the constitution was being negotiated, not by giving the EU more control, but by giving this Parliament more control? Was not that another example of the Prime Minister's opportunism—his readiness to jump on any passing bandwagon, only to jump off when the issue stops hitting the headlines?

The Prime Minister says that his policy of following, not leading, gives him more influence, but this summit was meant to be about economic reform—so where has that got to? The red tape continues—his own Members of the European Parliament keep voting for even more—the EU is not on track to meet the targets that it set at Lisbon, and 14 million Europeans are unemployed. So much for the Prime Minister's leadership.

The Leader of the House once claimed that the constitution was just "a tidying-up exercise", but the Prime Minister told a Cabinet committee that the outcome of the Convention would be absolutely fundamental and would last for generations. The German Foreign Minister said:

"We have a draft constitution that is worthy of the word historic."

The Belgian Prime Minister describes it as the "capstone" of a "federal state".

Let us remind ourselves of what the Prime Minister once said:

"Where there is clear constitutional change . . . the case"

for a referendum

"is very strong . . . Many other countries do it. It's entirely sensible if you're deciding how a country is governed".

The constitution will indeed decide how this country is governed. The Government have held 34 referendums, including one on a mayor for Hartlepool and another on a mayor for Sedgefield. Soon, there will be a 35th on a mayor for Ceredigion, and three on regional government are to follows this autumn, but on this historic issue he refuses the British people a say.

Let me make it clear: any proposal for a new constitution must be put to the British people. At least seven other member states of the European Union are giving their people a say. The Irish Government will trust the Irish people; the Dutch Government will trust the Dutch people; the Danish Government will trust the Danish people; and the Portuguese Government will trust the Portuguese people. Why will the right hon. Gentleman's Government not trust the British people? The Prime Minister says, trust him: we say, trust the people.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right that there are two differing views on handling Libya—and he holds them both. It is better that we continue sensibly, and with our eyes open about Libya's record, on the path of constructive engagement that, since December, has already yielded a substantial amount of benefit and progress in respect of Libya's chemical and nuclear weapons.

On counter-terrorism here, there is a security co-ordinator, Sir David Omand, and there is a politician in charge—the Home Secretary.

The constitution is not essential for enlargement to take place, but it is essential to make it work, which is what is important. A Europe of 25 will not be able coherently to take decisions unless it reforms the way in which it works.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that nothing had been done in respect of economic reform. I think that he is wrong. He referred to the number of unemployed people in Europe. It is true that there are a large number—far too many—but there are 6 million fewer than there were a few years ago before the onset of the Lisbon process. I remind him that in Britain there are 1.75 million more people in jobs and that there has been the biggest reduction in unemployment since 1975.

On the details of the constitutional treaty, I make it clear again that we will protect each one of the red lines that we have set out—on tax, social security, our abatement, foreign policy and defence, and our criminal justice system. Our ability to determine those matters is part of our nationhood, and we shall insist on them.

I shall also deal with some of the myths that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised. He criticises us over the European Union arrest warrant. There already is a European Union arrest warrant. He criticises us over the common fisheries policy. I remind him that it was his Government who negotiated the terms of the CFP.

The one area that I noticed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not raise was that of asylum, although he has been speaking about it recently—most recently on "Today", when he accused us of having to give in to EU standards of asylum and of being forced to accept quotas on asylum from the EU. It is odd that he did not repeat that charge today in the House of Commons. The reason he did not, of course, is that he knows perfectly well that we have an opt-in to any measure on asylum that we want. It is absolute rubbish to suggest that Europe can determine our immigration and asylum laws. We secured that, whereas his Government failed to do so during the Amsterdam negotiations in 1997. Let us hear no more of the Conservative party trying to run the issue of asylum into the issue of the European Union.

Let us make it clear again that, on crime, the treaty is not acceptable at present. That is why we will not accept anything that overturns habeas corpus, trial by jury or sentencing. Where there are, however, cross-border issues to be dealt with, we will be perfectly happy to deal with them.

I shall deal with another myth that the right hon. and learned Gentleman expounded today: that the charter of fundamental rights somehow enlarges the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice. The terms of the treaty expressly state that it does not do so.

As a result of what we managed to negotiate, it is absolutely clear that NATO is the cornerstone of our defence, and that nothing that is inconsistent with NATO can be done through the EU.

Other myths, to mention some of the others that the Conservative party has been trotting out recently, are that we would give up our UN Security Council seat—not true; that we would surrender control over our borders—not true; and that there would be a European diplomatic service to replace the British Foreign Office—not true. The Conservatives want to fight the issue on myths, not on the reality of what is proposed.

Let us deal with some of the other myths not always mentioned by the Conservative party—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the questions."] I am indeed answering the questions. There are the myths that we are to be told to switch to driving on the right; that the Queen is to be stripped of her powers; or that the Germans are to take over our nuclear weapons. [Interruption.] Yes, it is fantasy rubbish, and it comes from the Conservative party.

There is now a clear divide between the two parties. The Opposition's position, announced a few days ago, is that, if elected, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will re-open negotiations on the treaty. Indeed, he disagrees not just with the contents, but with the very idea of a constitution, so if the rest of Europe agrees it, he will renegotiate it out of existence.

What referendum did the right hon. and learned Gentleman give people over the Maastricht treaty? He went into the Lobby to vote against a referendum on the

[The Prime Minister]

Maastricht treaty. He would have to renegotiate the constitutional treaty with every other member of the European Union, and now, instead of 15 members, we have 25. Which Government from the other 24 supports the position of having no constitution? Even if we expand Europe so that there are 28 countries, not 25, which of the 27 agrees with his position? None. He said the other day on "Today" that he thought that the German Conservatives might agree with his position.

Mr. Howard: Some of them.

The Prime Minister: Ah, "Some", he says. This is what the leader of the German Conservative party said a few days ago:

"Without the European constitution, Europe doesn't have a future", which is not a ringing endorsement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's position, is it? Let me read what the German Conservatives say in their manifesto for the European Parliament:

"We strongly support the draft European Constitution".

So he does not have the support of the German Conservatives. What other party in Europe supports his position?

We now know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would renegotiate the treaty without the support of any other Government in the EU, despite the fact that he would need the agreement of every other Government to make that stick. What would he do? He would either have associate membership, as urged on him by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), who represented the Conservative party on the Convention, or he would have to back down and we would face humiliation. Let no one forget that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was Home Secretary, and when there was the great non-co-operation over BSE—do we remember that?—he made a British proposal in the Justice and Home Affairs Council, but then had to go along to the Council and veto it on the basis that he was not co-operating. That is what the Opposition would reduce our country to.

We will protect our essential national interests and no positions will be taken that are inconsistent with that. However, our national interest also means accepting that a Europe of 25 must work more effectively. That position—between constructive engagement and renegotiation of our essential membership of the European Union—is the dividing line between the two political parties. That is a debate in the country and in the House to which we look forward with enthusiasm.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I welcome the Prime Minister's statement and the underlying sense of regained political momentum that underpins it at a European level. That is particularly encouraging after the recent stalls and setbacks, both those of a political nature and those arising from the dreadful terrorist atrocities in Spain.

On Libya, we support the Prime Minister and the Government in their initiative. The House will understand that those of us who view such matters from a Scottish perspective will never allow the dreadful memories and images of Lockerbie to fade. It was significant last week that, despite the understandably divided opinions among those who were most directly affected by that dreadful event, a degree of welcome and understanding was none the less expressed about the need to establish dialogue. Does the Prime Minister agree that it is not good enough to will the ends from the sidelines, only to carp and criticise about the means?

In his discussions with Gaddafi, did the Prime Minister touch on the vexed issue of possible weaponry sales to Libya? Was any level of detail entered into in those discussions concerning, for example, the types of systems involved and the use to which they might be put?

On terrorism generally, a very broad welcome must be given to the declaration on combating terrorism and, as he is a former leader of the European Liberals, to the appointment of our friend Gijs de Vries as the first terrorism co-ordinator. We wish him every success. The Prime Minister will be aware that the Liberal Democrats, both in Brussels and here in Westminster, supported the European arrest warrant at the time of its introduction—not all did so, it must be remembered—but I hope that he recognises that it is important to continue to stress that that measure and several others have been fast-tracked since the atrocious events of 11 September. Will he bear in mind throughout the need to keep a judicious balance between the safety of European citizens and their civil liberties?

In broad terms, EU co-operation on the crackdown on financing terrorism and on shared intelligence and existing legal instruments deserves support at that level, but at this level, in Westminster, we do not feel that the rushed responses of the Home Secretary limiting the right to trial and appeal, limiting access to evidence and lowering the burden of proof deserve support. That will remain our position.

Finally, on the fresh impetus that has now been given post Convention to the work on the constitution, we have always argued that a constitution is necessary and welcome because it will define and make clear the limits of European Union power. Indeed, as somebody who is unequivocally pro-European, I have always been puzzled about why somebody of a more Eurosceptical disposition—a perfectly honourable view to take—is not more in favour of a defined constitution that allows us to know the limits and legitimacy of the European operation and the transparency and accountability of those limits, and builds in an appeal process for the individual citizen to follow when they feel that the European Union, through whichever of its component institutions, is overstepping the mark.

The constitution is necessary to help to build in stability, not least after enlargement. There has been a bit of an ongoing cultural revolution about Europe, which never seems to end, and a period of stability would be welcome. The Government's red lines are welcome, and we continue to endorse them, as the Prime Minister knows. Looking back to the experience on Maastricht—on behalf of our party, I spoke and voted in favour of a referendum at the time, and noted those who did not find the idea of a referendum at all attractive or favourable—surely, if the new revised constitution that emerges from the further discussions that are to take place involves constitutional implications, as the present one does, a referendum would be the right way to go.

I think that the Prime Minister would agree that consistency is a good thing in these matters. Will he assure us that, whether on Libya or the need for a referendum on the eventual constitution, all of us as party leaders should avoid the trap of saying one thing in one place, and another thing in another?

The Prime Minister: First, in respect of Libya, I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's statement of support, for which I am grateful. In respect of anything to do with weapons sales or military and defence co-operation, as I said last week, I have appointed General Searby to handle these issues for us. Obviously, this has to proceed in a very careful way, and we are at the beginning of the process.

It may be worth pointing out to the House that part of the reason why I felt that it was possible to go to Libya last week and, in a sense, make a formal statement of support for the process is what Libya has done between its decision in December and now. It has taken measures that augur extremely well for the future—they must be maintained, but none the less they are specific—for example, providing unrestricted access to facilities and giving full answers to the questions that have been posed. The Libyans have actually volunteered information that has allowed us to know the proper extent of their chemical and nuclear weapons programmes; they have signed the additional protocol to the International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards agreement, which allows intensive, even intrusive, inspections; they have ratified the comprehensive test ban treaty; they have deposited the instrument of ratification for the chemical weapons convention; they have made a full declaration to the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons of their production of chemical weapons; and they have facilitated the removal from Libya of highly sensitive documentation and literally tonnes of WMD-related equipment. As a result of those changes, we felt that going to Libya was the right thing to do.

In respect of the European issues, the right hon. Gentleman and I will probably disagree about terrorism and legal powers. The arrest warrant is a necessary part of ensuring that we make Europe work more effectively. Of course, it is right to say that the constitutional treaty makes it expressly clear for the first time that the only competencies that the European Union will have are those that are conferred on it specifically by member states, which is an important development and change.

The reason why I disagree so strongly with the Conservative party about a full-time chairman of the European Council—a proposition, incidentally, opposed by the federalists in Europe—is that it gives the Council an opportunity to draw up a coherent agenda, which a rotating six-month presidency simply will not do. A full-time chairman is an important measure for efficiency in a European Union of 25.

Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and indeed his actions, particularly with regard to Libya.

Amid the hysteria of some sections of the press and of the Leader of the Opposition, does he welcome the editorial in Saturday's Financial Times, which describes the draft treaty as "giving clearer decision-making procedures; a clarification of who does what in the EU; and a greater involvement for national Parliaments",

and

"that it therefore presents the EU as it is... and not as the 'superstate' of eurosceptic myth"?

Does he agree that exaggerating the effect of the constitution does British citizens a disservice?

The Prime Minister: Yes. That is exactly what the Conservative party said about the Amsterdam treaty and the Nice treaty, which were also supposed to be the end of Britain as we know it. Those who are now in charge of the Conservative party were the Eurosceptics who caused such difficulties for the previous Government on Maastricht. If we attempted to renegotiate the essential terms of Britain's membership of the European Union, it would be a disaster for this country, and it would put at risk all the gains that Britain has made in the European Union.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Did the Prime Minister discuss with his European colleagues the excellent suggestion, which he is reputed to have made to President Bush, that monitors from well-disposed countries should be interposed by agreement between Israel and the Palestinian state to stop further death and destruction in that area?

The Prime Minister: I did not discuss those proposals specifically. If there is a chance of getting the process restarted, however, we are looking at how we ensure that the Palestinian Authority can take security measures that give confidence to everybody that what they say they are doing on security is actually done, so that next time there is a suicide bomber or a breach of security, there can be some clear way to determine whether the Palestinian Authority are complicit—as they say they are not—or not. We will continue to discuss that matter not only with the Americans but with the Israeli Government and others.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): It will come as no surprise to the Prime Minister if I say—as a long-standing opponent of the Common Market and the European Union, even when the Tories were in power and voting for it—that we need this argument like a hole in the head. I am amazed that this matter has been brought forward once again. Is it not indicative that yesterday the author of the new constitution, Giscard d'Estaing, was defeated in the French elections? He has been put out to pasture; I suggest to my right hon. Friend that the best thing we can do with this issue is to put it into the long grass, as well.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has been entirely consistent on this issue from the very outset, but I am afraid that I have to disagree with him. One need only sit round the table with 25 other states in the European Union to realise that it simply cannot work without changes to the way in which it operates.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): But if there were to be a referendum, does the Prime Minister think that he would win?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the vast majority of people in this country think it is sensible that we remain part of the European Union. [Interruption.] No, no. Let us be clear about this. The position that has now been adopted by the leader of the Conservative party is that the Conservatives want to reopen negotiations on the constitution, that they disagree with many of its contents, and that they oppose the idea of having a European Union constitution. So in any debate that takes place in the country, the choice is absolutely fundamental: it is between those who want to renegotiate Britain's essential terms of entry and those who believe that Britain's future lies in Europe. I believe that that is a debate that we can and will win.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I think that all parties would welcome my right hon. Friend's statement regarding counter-terrorist legislation, the database of forensic material and better intelligence sharing. However, does he agree that the matching pair to go with those measures is an acceptance that there must be a strong European agreement based on principles such as those in the Data Protection Act 1998 to ensure that privacy and data protection are also dealt with on a pan-European basis?

The Prime Minister: In any actions that are taken, it is important that we carefully balance civil liberties with the need to take strong measures against terrorism. Of course, those measures will essentially remain our decision. In so far as we co-operate with other countries in Europe, it is of course important to respect people's civil liberties.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Has the Prime Minister closed his mind completely to the possibility of a referendum on this important treaty? Does he not think that it would create a new sense of unity in all the parties if he let the people decide on this important issue? On a detail, can he at least give me a promise that he will not sign the treaty if any attempt is made to remove article 59 on page 32, which for the first time since the treaty of Rome makes legal provision for countries to withdraw from the European Union if they wish to?

The Prime Minister: What the hon. Gentleman says in the last part of his question is one of the advantages in making that quite specific. Of course, countries can withdraw from the European Union if they want to. That is precisely what the hon. Gentleman and some of his colleagues in the Conservative party want. I understand and respect that; we simply disagree about it. In respect of the referendum, my position remains unchanged.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Is not the real reason why the Prime Minister will not commit the European constitution to the people the fact that he knows that he would lose that vote?

The Prime Minister: No. I believe that in the end, faced with a decision on whether to remain part of the European Union, which is in effect the position— [Interruption.] I am afraid that the Conservative party will have to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is getting to the stage where every time the Prime Minister speaks, certain Members wish to shout him down. There is a danger that I will go on to the next statement and hon. Members will not get an opportunity to question the Prime Minister.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): Can the Prime Minister think of a single country in Europe where the news of the European Union's failure to reach agreement on the constitution last December was met with public dismay?

The Prime Minister: Across Europe, there was an understanding that we needed to have a change in the European Union, but there is no doubt that some countries—for example, Poland and Spain—had genuine difficulties with some of the issues. However, I remember being told on 15 December by the Conservative party—indeed, possibly by the hon. Gentleman—that we should have followed the lead of the plucky Poles and said no to the constitution. It was never the case that anyone else in Europe would say no to the whole document because everybody who is trying to make the EU work knows that a Europe of 25—and perhaps subsequently Bulgaria, Romania and Turkey—cannot work in the same way as it does now.

If we want Europe to be effective, we must make the changes. The Conservative party wants not only to renegotiate the terms of the treaty but to renegotiate so that there is no constitutional treaty. That is its position. The reason why I say that that would lead to a fundamental reconsideration of our terms of membership is that no other country in Europe is in that position. We would thus be left with either a fundamental pledge—doubtless what many people in the Conservative party want—or a swindle because people will not get a fundamental renegotiation of the treaty.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Most would support the Prime Minister's visit to Gaddafi for the reasons that he stated. However, is it not the case that the Libyan regime is brutal, denies all forms of rights and hunts down dissidents, even when they have fled abroad? Did my right hon. Friend discuss human rights with Gaddafi, and what was Gaddafi's response?

The Prime Minister: We certainly did discuss human rights, democracy and freedom. I expressed my clear view that, ultimately, the best guarantor of our security is the spread of those values—the rule of law, human rights and democracy. I do not pretend that things in Libya are as they should be but when a country that has been developing chemical or nuclear weapons for a significant period of time offers voluntarily to give them up, we should be prepared to help it to do that and then to help it develop in a way that hopefully moves towards human rights and democracy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Was there any discussion in the European Council or in its margins about financial accountability and management? Does the Prime Minister recall that, last year, the Comptroller and Auditor General asked the Government to apply pressure to ensure that financial accountability was improved in the 10 new states?

Closer to home, was there any discussion about the fact that the European Commission's accounts have been qualified every year for the past nine years? Before we load more functions on the European Commission, does the Prime Minister agree that we must improve its financial accountability?

The Prime Minister: I agree that the Commission's financial accountability should be improved and we are working for that. The same is true of the 10 new member states.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): The Prime Minister will know that the Secretary-General of NATO and senior UN officials laid blame for the latest outbreak of violence in Kosovo firmly at the door of Albanian extremists who want separatism. Three thousand more Serbs have lost their homes, adding to the 200,000 who already live in camps in Serbia and Montenegro. More churches and monasteries have been attacked, adding to the 154 that have been burnt out in the past five years. When will Europe arrest those criminals? Let us have a genuinely peaceful settlement in Kosovo.

The Prime Minister: Europe is taking the measures that can be taken to prosecute those responsible. I agree with my hon. Friend that there can be absolutely no support for or tolerance of what we have seen in Kosovo. It is important to recognise that, compared with our position a few years ago, substantial progress has been made, but I am afraid that it will take a long time for some of the ethnic disagreements that have marked the Balkans for a long time to be properly cured. It will probably happen only when those countries and parts of Europe see their future in the European Union.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): At a time of unprecedented crisis in the fishing industry and unparalleled mismanagement of the common fisheries policy, is not it noteworthy that the Prime Minister did not mention fisheries in his statement? Will he confirm that the Government are still prepared to enshrine fisheries as an exclusive competence in the EU constitution and that Scottish voters will have no say in the matter in a referendum?

The Prime Minister: There is not a change to the commons fisheries policy, but it is important to understand that it would be a disaster for the fishing industry if Britain were to withdraw from the policy. We would then be completely unable properly to organise the destiny of our fishing industry, because the rules that no longer applied to us would no longer apply to other member states. That is why no Government have responsibly advocated or done such a thing. We know the reasons for the problems in the fishing industry: they have arisen because of the overfishing of certain areas for a long period, not because of the common fisheries policy. It would be a cruel deception to tell the people working in the industry that if we withdrew from the policy we would somehow be able to protect their jobs. We would not.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend undertake to publish a plain person's guide to the draft treaty and, in an appendix, provide a comparison between the extension of powers in this draft treaty and those in the Maastricht treaty, to expose the synthetic indignation and fury of the Leader of the Opposition, who was implacably opposed to a referendum on Maastricht but who seems to think it essential to have one now?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is a sensible idea for us to publish a guide so that people can see exactly what is in the treaty, and so that we can debate the matter as the treaty goes through the House of Commons. He is also right to say that the previous Conservative Government agreed huge extensions to qualified majority voting. The Single European Act was probably the biggest such extension, and that was a perfectly sensible thing to do. I have to point out, however, that a major part of the present problems—in so far as there are problems in this regard—come from the working time directive, and it was the Leader of the Opposition who, as Employment Minister, spent a significant period of time in charge of that.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): The Prime Minister said that he hoped to sign the treaty by the end of June. Is there not, therefore, a certain sense of urgency surrounding this matter? When are we going to see a Bill before the House? Will it be before the next Queen's Speech or after it?

The Prime Minister: We shall have to wait until the constitutional treaty is agreed. Once that has happened, we shall proceed in the normal way.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): In his discussions with the leader of Libya, did the Prime Minister raise the question of that leader's continued support for Mugabe in Zimbabwe? What discussions did he have about that support now being withdrawn so that we might begin to influence some of the African leaders to take a much more robust stance against that dictator?

The Prime Minister: As a matter of fact, we did have a discussion on Zimbabwe, in which I made plain our disagreement with things that Colonel Gaddafi has said. I hope that, as one part of the dialogue that we have with Libya, we can change his mind on that issue. The position that the Libyans adopt at the moment is not right. It is based on a false understanding of the situation, which is that Britain is somehow not prepared to help the resettlement of the farming issue. We are prepared to help in that way; we have set aside money for the United Nations Development Programme to administer, but we are not prepared for that money to go to Mugabe's henchmen. That would be corrupt and wrong. Libya is not in the same position as us at the present time, but I hope that it will be possible, partly through this dialogue, to change minds.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): The Prime Minister said that he wanted to maintain Europe's competitive edge. What is that edge?

The Prime Minister: Europe is a highly competitive economy.

Mr. Forth: What?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry; I have no doubt that Europe has its economic problems, like lots of other places. But the notion that Europe as a whole is a failed economy is completely absurd. The fact is that the European Union single market will be the biggest commercial market in the world. The right hon. Gentleman is unable to accept anything good about the European Union at all. He and many other Conservative Members have a position on the European Union that everything in Europe is wrong and that it has nothing to offer. Actually, it has a great deal to offer in terms of the economy, security and political influence.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. Some of us were in the European Parliament in 1979, and we remember the attitudes of the Conservatives at that time. They have not changed one iota. They were so extreme in 1979 that none of the right-wing parties in Europe wanted anything to do with them, and they had great difficulty forming any partnerships whatever. This new constitution is a plus for the 25 European Union countries, and it also addresses traditional British concerns. I very much welcome it.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for her support and I believe she is right.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that the Prime Minister told the House on 18 June 1997 that the subsidiarity and proportionality protocol of the treaty of Amsterdam would have "real teeth", and that the Foreign Secretary said on 21 May last year that in practice the protocol had proved unsatisfactory and that they are now trying to dream up a new blue print for the future, has the Prime Minister the good grace to admit that his gung-ho optimism in June 1997 was misplaced? Alternatively, can he identify three examples of successful legislative repeal under the terms of the protocol?

The Prime Minister: The constitutional treaty will make the situation better because, for the first time, there will be the ability, if a third of national Parliaments wish it, for the European Union and the Commission to be made to reconsider any proposal. That, precisely, is where the teeth are. I agree that we have taken a long time to get round to it—that is absolutely true—but I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that it is surely better to have such a provision than not to have it.

Of course, if we adopted the position that the hon. Gentleman's party has outlined, we would be left without the constitutional treaty—at least Britain would be; I think other countries would simply move ahead without us—and the provision that allows, for the first time, national Parliaments a proper say in the issue of European legislation.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): When the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) advised against speaking with one voice in one place and with another in another, I wondered whether that same discipline applies to his Members in the House and in the European Parliament when they talk about Europe.

The Prime Minister referred in his statement to the changes in the Council of Ministers. As he goes on to improve the draft that was handed to him last summer, will he pay attention to whether the institutions of Europe are fit for purpose? I am not entirely convinced that the way in which either the Commission or the European Parliament works is fit for purpose as it stands.

The Prime Minister: First, I thank my hon. Friend for the work that she did as a Convention member, which was excellent, particularly on the praesidium. She is also right in saying that neither the Commission nor the Council as they currently function will be able to carry out their work as effectively as they need to. That is precisely the reason for the change. If anything, the constitutional treaty needs to go further in the direction of a more streamlined Commission and to make it absolutely clear that the Council of Ministers is the body that will set the agenda for the European Union.

One reason why the treaty is so important—if it were only possible to debate what is in the treaty as opposed to what is not—is that with a rotating presidency whereby a different country takes over the presidency of the European Union every six months, owing to the fact that 10 new countries, many of which are very small, are about to join, the EU simply would not be able to function. Already round the table are 25, or 28 for some discussions, so the impossibility of the situation comes home very clearly, which is one reason why we need the treaty.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Does the Prime Minister believe that article 3 of the European convention on human rights should be amended so that the provisions of the Geneva convention can be complied with—provisions that give the countries concerned the right to return refugees regarded as a danger to security?

The Prime Minister: Of course, that convention is not an issue to do with the European Union, as the hon. Gentleman will know, but I think it is important that we balance the right of those people who are genuine refugees who seek asylum in this country with the interests of national security. That is one of the issues that we will be thinking about very carefully when we come to look at new laws in relation to terrorism.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that for every citizen in this country we want and need a European Union that works efficiently and effectively—whether that is on jobs, terrorism, security or anything else—and that the rule book is no longer up to the task? We need the new constitution to ensure, in an enlarged Europe, that the EU works for every man, woman and child in our country.

The Prime Minister: That is exactly why we need it.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Will the Prime Minister bear it in mind that many of us who strongly support his stand on terrorism and on giving the opportunity of democracy to the people of Iraq are concerned that he has set his face so firmly at this point against a referendum on the European constitution, although the issues are potentially far more significant than anything entailed in the Maastricht treaty, with the two opt-outs negotiated for Britain?

The Prime Minister: Quite simply, I disagree profoundly with the hon. Gentleman in relation to Maastricht and the Single European Act. Precisely the same points were made about the Amsterdam treaty back in 1997, when we were told that it would mean the end of Britain as a nation state and it meant no such thing.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): May I congratulate the Prime Minister on going to Libya as he has done? As the UK's relations with Libya develop, as we all hope they will, may I ask him and his colleagues to listen to the voices of the Libyan exiled community in the UK, many of whom have worked over the years at BBC Monitoring in my constituency, providing information on that country?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a fair point.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will the Prime Minister agree that it would be far better to delay legislation in the House until the results of the referendums in the free countries of Europe on this subject are known? Indeed, would it not be better to delay it until the general election, so that we can have a vote to sort it out? His journey might not then be necessary.

The Prime Minister: All that I can say is that the 10 new member states of the European Union are all proud nations, many of which have effectively just achieved nationhood as a result of their liberation from old-style communist rule. It is extremely important to recognise that each one of those 10 countries is in favour of having this constitutional treaty. It is not true that a majority of countries are having referendums—actually, a majority probably are not. What is important, however, is that we have this debate on the basis of what the treaty actually says. In the course of that debate, it is important that people such as the right hon. Gentleman—whose view I respect in terms of it being very clear, but the fact is that he would renegotiate our essential terms of membership—express their view. That debate is well worth having, but we can have it in the House.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): On the middle east and Libya, does the Prime Minister see a prospect of similar progress on Syria and Iran, which would be key to unlocking progress on the road map between the Palestinians and Israelis? Did he notice that the Leader of the Opposition barely even mentioned the middle east? Is that not symptomatic of his knee-jerk opposition to and obsession with Europe and all things European?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that the position of Syria and Iran will be important, particularly if we manage to restart some process to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian issue. It will be important that they co-operate fully, as they should be doing in any event, in stopping all sponsorship and help towards terrorist organisations. One thing that is for sure is that the single biggest obstacle at the moment to real movement on the middle east is the existence of those terrorist groups, financed and sponsored from abroad.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): How did the Prime Minister get on with Spanish Prime Minister-elect Zapatero? Has he convinced him that the Iraq war was not a war based on lies? Has he changed the rather unflattering and unrepeatable assessment of him by some of the Spanish Prime Minister-elect's closest advisers?

The Prime Minister: Probably not. There will be a disagreement between us and the new Spanish Government on Iraq. I believe that our position on Iraq was right, and in any event, whatever the rights and wrongs of the conflict and the war, it must surely be the duty and the interest of every single one of our countries to make sure that we constitute Iraq as a proper, stable and democratic country. The Iraqi people are the last who want us to quit before the job is done.

Organised Crime

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on our strategy to tackle organised crime.

Although crime has fallen, a substantial challenge remains to turn round those aspects of criminality that threaten the very fabric of our society. The success of the police and other law enforcement agencies should not lead to complacency. We know that a great deal still needs to be done to tackle specific areas of criminality, including organised crime.

Organised crime is big business. It costs around £40 billion a year. Its effects are corrosive. It corrupts society and spreads fear and intimidation. It operates across frontiers and reaches into every neighbourhood, especially some of the most deprived parts of our country. Lives are destroyed by drugs, smuggling and prostitution. It is a major contributor to low-level crime, abuse and exploitation. It exploits every technique of modern technology. It uses identity theft, the internet and modern secure communications. Such criminals employ many of the same methods as those who run terrorist networks. Indeed, there is clear evidence that many terrorists seek to finance their activity through organised crime.

That means that, now more than ever, we need to make a step change in our response, so we are setting a clear objective of year-on-year reductions in the harm that organised crime causes the United Kingdom and its citizens. We will make the UK one of the most difficult environments in the world for organised crime, and we will work closely with our partners to undermine its international effects. Today's White Paper sets out our strategy to achieve those goals. We will create a powerful new agency, the serious organised crime agency. We will take new powers to disrupt activity and to convict those responsible, and we will enhance our capability to stay one step ahead.

Let me deal with those points in turn. I announced to the House last month our intention to create the agency, and since then we have consulted on how it should operate. It will bring together responsibilities that currently fall to the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the National Crime Squad, the parts of the immigration service that deal with organised immigration, and the parts of Customs and Excise that deal with drug and people trafficking and related financial investigations. I pay clear tribute to the professionalism and dedication of the staff of those agencies, who have done such a good job over the years. The new agency will build on their success. It will bring together resources in a single organisation with a clear focus on drugs, people trafficking and financial crime. It will enable us to make more effective use of intelligence and to work more closely with specialist prosecutors. It will enable us to bring more criminals to justice and reduce the harm that they cause.

The White Paper describes how the new agency will operate. It will be a non-departmental public body with operational independence, overseen by a small strategic board accountable to Ministers for the delivery of priorities set out by them. It will be chaired by a part-time non-executive, and will be led operationally by a full-time director general. We will advertise both posts shortly.

We will legislate to bring the new agency into being as soon as parliamentary time allows, but in the meantime existing agencies will work together increasingly to share objectives and a common strategy. Thus we shall begin to see the practical benefits of change during the transitional period. The creation of the agency will give us an opportunity to consider how best to improve performance and co-ordination, especially in the securing of our borders.

We will ensure, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.] Sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker. I must always get my gender right on these occasions.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): You can change it if you want.

Mr. Blunkett: That is for later in the week, I think.

We will ensure that Customs, special branch and the immigration service work together effectively. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I will direct the heads of all those services to develop more closely aligned objectives and priorities through their individual business plans. That will ensure co-ordinated, strategically driven operational activity. The arrangements will not interfere with any existing structures of accountability.

Nowhere is that co-ordinated approach more important than in the battle against terrorism. At present, each of the 43 police forces maintains a separate special branch. Terrorists respect no such boundaries. I believe that we can significantly enhance effectiveness through greater co-ordination of activity, so I am creating a new national system to pool intelligence and co-ordinate operations. My announcement on 19 March of an extra £15 million, together with the strengthening of the counter-terrorism branch of the Metropolitan police, will enable us to achieve that goal more readily.

Defeating organised crime is not just about structures and effective operations. The powers available to our agencies to deter, disrupt and protect are critical. We need to make the best possible use of our existing powers, whether they are probation licence conditions or asset recovery, immigration or tax powers. It was, after all, Elliot Ness from the Revenue who was crucial in achieving the conviction of Al Capone.

The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 is significant in our efforts to deprive criminals of their assets. The new cash seizure powers are netting £1 million a week, and we are on track to meet this year's overall target of recovering £45 million, but there is still much that we can do. We will ensure better use of intelligence and the better management of information, and we will make sure that prosecutors are involved at an early stage. Recent changes to the law have provided a more effective framework, but no group of defendants is more adept at manipulating legal safeguards. Such people make corruption and intimidation part of their system of defence.

As organised crime becomes more complex and organised criminals more sophisticated, the need grows for new powers to gather evidence and for effective incentives for defendants to testify against their criminal associates. We will therefore build on the powers in the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

With my right hon. Friend the Attorney-General and other colleagues I have fundamentally reviewed the powers of our law enforcement agencies. As a result, we propose to create Serious Fraud Office powers to compel the production of documents and information and to put Queen's evidence on a statutory footing to encourage defendants to plead guilty and testify against co-defendants. We are also taking forward the idea of a national witness protection programme, and we will create new licence conditions to ensure that the finances of serious criminals are kept under close scrutiny after their release.

Other reviews are relevant to this work, including that on the use of intercept material in court, on which we will provide a definitive proposal shortly; that on the law on conspiracy and secondary participation; and, of course, Sir Michael Bichard's review of data retention and information sharing among police forces. With my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, I shall also ask the Sentencing Guidelines Council to review the existing sentencing regime to produce sentences that match more clearly the gravity of the underlying offences and the harm caused.

Finally, we need to ensure a clear focus on our protection of areas of organised crime where most damage is done. That means transforming the quality of our intelligence-driven effort. We must increase the risks and reduce the benefits of operating in that field.

The United Kingdom has never before produced a comprehensive strategy to tackle organised crime. With a new ministerial committee, under my chairmanship, and a better understanding of the harm caused, we have the building blocks to adopt a focused approach. The proposals that I am publishing today will define a new approach for the 21st century that will match the threat and the sophistication that we face. Defeating organised criminals is an objective that I know we all share. I commend the White Paper to the House.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I thank the Home Secretary for giving us advance sight of his statement. I want to put it on the record that I support the principles contained in the Home Secretary's announcement. We have advocated for a long time the creation of an agency such as he has described, but my concern, as ever, is that a policy that enjoys all-party support in this House can turn out very badly if, as a result, it is not subjected to rigorous scrutiny. Indeed, that is particularly important where civil liberties are concerned.

I want to raise several specific points, the first of which concerns plea bargaining, as the Home Secretary described the issue of Queen's evidence. We support his announcement, and the introduction of such a measure is overdue. Plea bargaining has worked well in countries such as Australia and America, but there have been problems historically in Northern Ireland. It creates a situation whereby it is to the advantage of a criminal to, as the jargon has it, fit somebody up. There can be no greater miscarriage of justice than an innocent man being jailed so that a criminal can go free. How will the Home Secretary ensure that that will not happen?

We welcome the Home Secretary's announcement on intercepts. We are on the record as calling for the Government to lift the UK's self-imposed ban on the use of telephone intercepts in court, but, again, there are dangers. Obviously, we must ensure that we do not compromise the intelligence services. Moreover, intelligence information is, by its very nature, difficult to verify. It is imperative that we take steps to ensure that innocent people are not convicted on intelligence that turns out to be wrong. How does the Home Secretary intend to deal with that problem?

I want to ask the Home Secretary about more general concerns relating to civil liberties. He did not refer to them today, but they have been discussed in the press in the past few weeks. Will the burden of proof in cases involving organised crime be lowered, as the Prime Minister suggested a few weeks ago? Furthermore, does the Home Secretary agree that any proposal that envisages convicting an individual on the basis of his own silence, and when there is no other evidence, would have serious implications for civil liberties?

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), has said that 5,000 people will work in the new agency. Does that involve any extra people, or are they being brought in from existing organisations? The head of the National Crime Squad has said that the agency will recruit officers from the police, and the Home Secretary is on record describing it as "an elite squad". Can he assure the House that the brightest and best in the police force will not be creamed off to fill places in the new agency? Does he agree that many extremely dedicated and talented people work in conventional policing, and that portraying them as somehow second class could damage police morale?

The Home Secretary rightly pointed out that terrorism depends on organised crime. Has he received representations on whether SOCA—as I presume we will call it—should cover terrorism? If it is not to include terrorism, how will it work with the counter-terrorist agencies that cover an enormous amount of exactly the same ground? Can he outline in more detail how SOCA will co-ordinate its work with the police? In particular, what impact will it have on the autonomy of chief constables, which is so vital to the independence of our police forces?

We support the general thrust of the proposal, but I remind the Home Secretary—he doubtless already knows—that the devil is in the detail, and particularly in the implementation.

Mr. Blunkett: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's response and his appreciation for what we are doing. He is right to say that the devil is in the detail, and that the Opposition should scrutinise not only today's announcement but the policy's implementation. Yes, we intend to have clear safeguards on plea bargaining, and it is vital that we learn any lessons that we can from Northern Ireland about injustices that have been perpetrated. Putting Queen's evidence on a statutory footing will help in that regard: such activity has been at the very fringes in this country, accounting for only approximately 1 per cent. of cases. That compares with the United States, in which such activity accounts for more than a quarter of similar cases.

[Mr. Blunkett]

It is also crucial that we get intercept evidence right. The right hon. Gentleman's colleague who deals with counter-terrorism made a useful contribution to our debate a month ago. As was said, we must ensure that we use such evidence for the right purpose in the right areas, which is why we are taking our time.

We will not recruit additional staff. We will pull together over 1,000 Customs and Excise staff to deal with the issues that I have described as well as staff from the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the National Crime Squad and the immigration service. There has been a problem with secondments to the National Crime Squad, which is why it requested, and we granted it, the opportunity to recruit directly. The new agency will also do that and will try to secure the right people. It is possible for someone to be brilliant at community policing, but not at dealing with the sort of activities that are relevant to the investigations of the new body, and vice versa.

It is vital to work closely with the police without threatening existing arrangements or the autonomy of chief constables. The president of the Association of Chief Police Officers has welcomed the new moves on the basis of the reassurances that we have given.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) asked about the threshold of evidence. When we originally announced the creation of the serious organised crime agency in February, the Prime Minister made it clear that we were talking about circumstances in which civil evidence was appropriate. That applies under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, which confers the ability to seize assets and move on from that into other activity. As I spelled out a month ago in our useful debate on counter-terrorism, some aspects are relevant to terrorism, and they could be applied to serious crime where civil evidence for a civil order is appropriate.

The licensing arrangements for post release—I mentioned them in my statement, and the White Paper covers them—are part of the process. Without threatening the evidence base for criminal law or the "beyond reasonable doubt" conditions, they will help us to be able to use our imagination in new ways to achieve new goals.

Overall, given that £375 million is at its disposal, it is important that the agency adds value in the sense of enabling us to tackle problems that we have not been able to tackle in the past. When I meet chief constables, such as the one in Merseyside, I find that they are crying out for a co-ordinated approach, which links intelligence in the new agency to the intelligence in the security services and the work of the counter-terrorism branch of the Metropolitan police. There is already close working on operational matters, but there should be a real thrust to backing operations at local policing level to deal with not just national but international activities of organised criminals. That is how we can achieve what I described in the statement and make the environment of Britain deeply unwelcome for those who ruin our lives.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows how keen I was during my time in the Home Office to see better co-ordination between what have sometimes, frankly, been conflicting organisations with different lines of accountability. I welcome his statement and the White Paper.

One problem that has bedevilled the fight against organised crime has been the organisation of intelligence information. Sometimes intelligence information links the community police officer with national information showing that someone is behind organised crime. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what progress has been made on implementation of the national intelligence model in police forces across the country to ensure that the information gathered by police officers at all different levels can be brought together effectively in support of the new agency?

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. Friend draws attention to a critical aspect of the problem—the ability to use the national intelligence model for volume crime at local level and to feed the patterns that it describes into the new regional intelligence cells, which special branch will now operate, and into the new organisation when it is up and running. We need the ability to share that intelligence not only more quickly but more effectively than before. I believe that it will really make a difference.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I thank the Home Secretary for advance notice of his statement, but, frankly, most of the detail has been running on the media since 8 o'clock this morning.

Liberal Democrats understand that organised crime and terrorism are complex issues that require complex solutions. That is why we recognise that, in this un-ideal world, we have to accept some un-ideal solutions. We support most of what the Home Secretary has said in the White Paper.

We support the idea of intercept communications, but why is the Home Secretary dragging his heels? Is he in favour or against, and when will the review be completed? Will he ensure that arrangements for accountability in the new agency, similar to those that operate for NCIS and the National Crime Squad, will be in place when it is established? Can he confirm that he will have no greater operational control of the new agency than he currently has?

Why has the Home Secretary rejected the idea of a national border force? On page 30 of the White Paper, he proposes to set up intelligence targets as part of performance review. What does he mean by that? In the documents, he continues to advance the idea of identity cards. Can he confirm that despite serious Cabinet objections he employs 33 members of staff to work full time on that project?

Mr. Blunkett: We are taking our time on intercept because—as is well known—there have been disagreements about its usage, how far it should go and which security and intelligence agencies or police forces might be involved in revealing their sources and methodology. That is why we have been modelling those aspects of organised crime and intelligence gathering that would be most appropriate for intercept use. I have made it clear that I have been won over to the belief that there is room for intercept evidence to be used judiciously. That will bring us in line with other countries, although those countries that use it do so in their investigatory, magisterial system, as opposed to the adversarial system used in English law.

On the issue of intelligence, I am mindful that the whole thrust of the new policy is to lift the level of performance. The new agency will provide that investigatory and intelligence thrust. We must also ensure that it works alongside others who have an interest in border control and management. It is clear, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer spelled out in revisions to the Inland Revenue and its amalgamation with the other aspects of excise, that it is important not to disrupt the collection of revenues. I would get shot if the Revenue lost money as a result of changes that I made. I am still discussing the spending review, even if some of my colleagues, such as those in health and education, have already settled, so I have a particular interest.

The hon. Gentleman asked about identity cards. I made a statement to the House on the progress we were making and on the imminent publication of a draft Bill. In order to produce a draft Bill and to undertake the gateway process for the Office of Government Commerce, staff are needed. One day, in the distant future, the hon. Gentleman may have the opportunity to learn about that, and I shall wish him well on my deathbed.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What powers and resources will the officers working for the new agency have to collect evidence and investigate crime committed abroad? In relation to serious international financial crimes, especially those of bribery and corruption, which were legislated against in the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, how will the new agency co-operate with the Serious Fraud Office, and which agency will be in the lead in the investigation and prosecution of such crimes?

Mr. Blunkett: In cases of serious fraud, it will be the Serious Fraud Office. I have already said that we will publish a separate paper on the SFO, because that fits well with dealing more broadly with issues of corruption. We want to get that right. Having had a consultation on corruption, the Attorney-General and I want to integrate the two.

I have already indicated that the powers of the SFO will be made available to the new agency. They will have to work hand in glove, but because the SFO operates differently and because we shall hold consultations in the months ahead about the section in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 that caused so much controversy, I want to ensure that we get things right.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Given the strength of the Newton committee's recommendation about the use of intercept, is the Home Secretary satisfied that there is a way of creating a distinct and separately authorised system for the use of intercept evidence that does not compromise the work of the intelligence agencies?

On a separate point, can he clarify whether the serious organised crime agency will have the same responsibilities in Scotland as in England and Wales, or has he yet to reach an understanding with the Scottish Executive on that matter?

Mr. Blunkett: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on the first point; it is possible to achieve that.

As the right hon. Gentleman has a border constituency, he will be familiar with the legal system in Scotland, which is different from that in England and Wales. Obviously, the existing powers for Customs and the National Criminal Intelligence Service will need to continue to operate UK-wide, but the devolved responsibilities of the Scottish Administration will, of necessity, involve us in detailed discussions on the new agency and its remit. We received a very warm welcome from the First Minister and the Secretary of State in relation to getting that right, and I look forward to the discussions continuing.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): May I urge my right hon. Friend not to dismiss the idea of a highly mobile, uniformed force for border policing to complement the agency that he has announced today? That function is still extremely important, as is illustrated by the Thames estuary where there is a multiplicity of agencies—Kent, Essex, the Met, the City police, the Port of London Authority, Customs and Excise and immigration control—but no coherent policy for scrutiny of small, fast, new-technology boats and craft, which can move swiftly to promote organised crime, people smuggling or terrorism in that very vulnerable area. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take that point back to his officials.

Mr. Blunkett: My hon. Friend has correctly been assiduous on this subject, but I might ask him to consider that his glass is three quarters full.

Andrew Mackinlay: Yes, yes.

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's affirmation.

Further progress can be made. Neither the changes in better co-ordination that we have announced nor the new agency will entirely resolve the issue that my hon. Friend raised. We still have room for manoeuvre, not least on the issue that he identified—new ways of developing smuggling. In fact, they are not so new; they replicate what went on in the 18th century, and although my beard is grey I am prepared to employ a black beard to tackle the problems in the future.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Will the Home Secretary confirm to the House and to those who may be viewing that there will still be safeguards to ensure that wiretaps are carried out responsibly? Perhaps it might happen only with the authority of local magistrates. What is his view of the vexed situation in America, whereby illegal wiretaps are accepted in court if they genuinely demonstrate the guilt of the person being tried? That is a difficult question. We do not want to encourage illegal wiretaps, but on the other hand we want a guilty person to be found guilty. Does the Home Secretary have a view on that?

Mr. Blunkett: I certainly have a view on the latter point. I do not want to use one of last week's clichés and say, "I am not going down that road", but I do not think that there is room in our country for the use of illegal methods. We should be stamping them out. None of us wants to be tapped illegally and I do not intend to advocate it.

On the hon. Gentleman's first point, yes, we need rigid safeguards. When we are dealing with that level of criminality, the Home Secretary must personally approve the agency's right to go ahead with an intercept in the first place, and although that has grown substantially, such approval is still the case and will remain so for as long as I am Home Secretary.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend should be commended for introducing proposals that are proportionate to the new challenges facing British security, and especially for the extra resources to be made available for counter-terrorism work. Will he confirm that the additional resources for the Met police will not lead to a reduction in the West Midlands police force's fight against terrorism? What representations has he received from the intelligence services on the use of intercepts? Does he envisage that they will have the ultimate veto on the use of intercept evidence in court?

Mr. Blunkett: On the first part of my hon. Friend's question, no, what I have announced will not interfere with developments in the regions of England and Wales, because I had already allocated £3 million. Part of the £15 million will go to establish the new regional intelligence cells and to the work of co-ordinating special branch. On the second part of his question, I do not intend to spell out this afternoon which agency is in favour of what. I read about such things in the newspapers, but I take such reports with as large a pinch of salt as I take press reports about intelligence and security issues in general. There will not be a veto, because we will lay down in which areas this will be appropriate, subject to the final decisions that stand to be taken by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Will the Home Secretary confirm that the number of police officers attached to NCIS is already being reduced from 260 to 100? Does he intend those experienced, trained and skilled investigators to be redeployed to the new agency, to ensure that their skills are not lost?

Mr. Blunkett: It is important that we do not lose the experience that people have gained. The officers in question were seconded and had come to the end of their secondment. It is important that, during the interregnum between now and the full operation of the agency, we give people an opportunity either to continue or to reapply, so that we do not lose their expertise and dislocate that experience.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): May I press my right hon. Friend further on narco-terrorism? He will be aware that this year's increased poppy harvest in Afghanistan will inevitably lead to more and cheaper heroin on Britain's streets, which will bring domestic criminal and health problems. In addition, profits from the trade are being used to fund terrorism in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Will he spell out how the various agencies will work together to combat what I believe will be acknowledged in the coming Session to be an increasing problem of narco-terrorism?

Mr. Blunkett: It certainly is a problem. I met President Karzai at the end of last year, and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has pressed the case strongly. We discussed how we could assist both within and across the borders of Afghanistan in tackling the organised criminal line that leads inexorably to much of the heroin arriving on our streets. Customs and Excise has done a good job of disruption and seizure, but the agency's role will be not only to work inside this country, but to link up with colleagues in other countries to tackle internationally the organised trade in narcotics.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Even though my colleagues in the Ulster Unionist party are not with me in body, I assure the Home Secretary that they are with me in spirit when I say that we support his statement today and the White Paper. Incidentally, we also support the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, who is sitting beside him.

I particularly welcome the Home Secretary's statement that "We will make the UK one of the most difficult environments in the world for organised crime". As he knows, organised crime in Northern Ireland is particularly nasty—very sophisticated, but very brutal. Will he give me an assurance today that, despite the sensitivities about supergrass evidence, non-jury trials and phone-tapping in Northern Ireland, the legislation introduced on the back of the White Paper will extend to Northern Ireland from the start, instead of colleagues of mine having to plead with him to extend it to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Blunkett: I always take notice of the hon. Lady. If I might be really cheeky, I think that I have said to her before that I prefer her body, wherever the spirit might be that she described this afternoon. [Interruption.] Of course it was a compliment. I know that the hon. Lady is still able to take a compliment, which is nice.

I am concerned that we do not resile from being able to use powers in Northern Ireland and that we are able to extend what has been done despite the difficulties that have been experienced, given that some of the most vivid examples of organised crime, nationally and internationally, have been provided by the way in which people have behaved towards one another in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of concern in the financial services industry that reports generated by the industry on suspected money laundering are not being fully pursued by the National Criminal Intelligence Service due to a lack of resources? Will he give an assurance that the arrangements that he has announced will strengthen the ability to investigate money laundering?

Mr. Blunkett: There is already a task force, precisely for the reason that my hon. Friend describes. There have been real difficulties. That needs to be fed into the operation of the agency, not least because getting the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad working in the same organisation will assist with the gathering, investigation and prosecution of that evidence.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): May I also endorse the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) in supporting the statement? Clearly we have some concerns about all aspects of civil liberties, but they will be discussed and debated at a later stage.

My concern relates to the City of London police, within my constituency. The Home Secretary will appreciate the important role that they play in relation to serious fraud, particularly the international element, to which the right hon. Gentleman has rightly referred. I endorse the words of the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) who asks where the resources will come from? A structure is in place but, as the Home Secretary will be aware, a number of the initiatives that the City of London police have taken, particularly with the police in Miami, on drug abuses have foundered in recent months because of a lack of funding.

I hope that the Home Secretary will give serious consideration to ensuring that such initiatives are properly resourced. It is all very well to have a structure in place but without proper resourcing, as we know from all areas of civil contingency protection, many of the advantages of new legislation and new policy will come to nought.

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that there have been detailed discussions with the City of London police on their relationship with the Serious Fraud Office and on the important role that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General believes can be played by their work. That has already involved resources.

I will make no commitment today because the City of London Corporation has, as ever, been full of its usual guile in making sure that our contribution is substantial regardless of the part of the pot to which it thinks that it can contribute. I will write to the hon. Gentleman separately on the way in which that progress is being made.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): I have spoken to police officers who have to deal with organised crime, especially drugs and people smuggling. They tell me that the vast majority of those who control this illegal trade do not live in this country. They live in Spain, Holland or elsewhere. How will my right hon. Friend deal with such an issue?

Mr. Blunkett: During the statement made earlier by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister we were discussing the importance of being able to co-operate across boundaries, to be able to pursue criminals throughout the rest of Europe, to be able to use the new arrest warrant that the House has already approved and to be able to ensure that through the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 we are able to seize the product of organised criminality. That will be crucial to getting things right. I am sure that the new Spanish Government will want to co-operate with us. They would not want on their doorstep or beaches the sort of criminals that we do not want on our doorstep or beaches.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Government's statement, although many of us are worried that the Home Secretary may be a bit soft on some elements. What steps is he taking to deal with the key support mechanisms for organised crime, such as the lawyers, bankers and accountants who appear to be beyond the reach of the law but who provide such important assistance to organised crime? What steps is he taking, together with the Treasury, to attack financial and banking jurisdictions of dubious quality? Does he intend to try to pursue jurisdictions that hide behind banking secrecy to allow not only money laundering, but the tax avoidance and tax evasion so often used by organised crime?

Mr. Blunkett: My hon. Friend has done my standing with The Guardian and The Independent a power of good by describing me as too soft. I am grateful to him for it. He asks a substantive question: how can we develop from the powers of the Serious Fraud Office the ability of the new agency not only to demand information, but to access documents and take the necessary steps, from which the National Crime Squad has so far been precluded, to get at the detail that my hon. Friend describes and to penetrate the wall erected to prevent people from getting at the truth? It is much more difficult to do so in the international context implied by his question. I believe that the proposed powers will be proportionate, and that they will be able to get behind the scenes as he described, which is essential to get to the truth.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I hope that I do not damage my right hon. Friend's reputation by welcoming the statement as a balanced package. I can see how the evidential changes in particular might make a real difference in the courtroom pursuit of organised crime. I am pleased that the new serious and organised crime agency will cover cross-border trafficking, people trafficking and immigration crime generally. On that theme, can my right hon. Friend expand on the comments that I think I heard him make this morning about backlog clearance in immigration cases?

Mr. Blunkett: The first thing that I should make clear is that those cases are not about asylum or about people flooding into our country. They deal substantially, as they have since the 1980s, with in-country renewal and claims that are dealt with on evidence already available. I shall lay in the Library a list of changes and operations undertaken since the late 1980s, through the 1990s and into the 21st century, all of which reflect the desire of successive Governments to use common-sense approaches to deal with a common-sense problem in such a way that those engaged in crime of any sort or terrorism present no threat to us and would be picked out in the normal way.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): It is a pleasure—indeed, a great joy—to welcome substantively all the general points made in the statement. May I, however, ask the Home Secretary for assurances on two points? First, in relation to plea bargaining, transparent plea bargaining has become long overdue in dealing with serious crime. May I ask for his assurance that he will consult those who practise—who prosecute and defend serious crime and serious criminals—so that we can get this difficult area of the law right before it comes back to Parliament? Secondly, may I ask the Home Secretary to assure the House that he will exercise very great caution in considering anything that interferes with or restricts legal professional privilege, lest we have the effect of discouraging and deterring the very best and most reputable of firms that deal with this area as a result of bringing in those that are not reputable, and thereby defeating the essential elements of the statement?

Mr. Blunkett: Having damaged my reputation for ever, I am about to damage it even further by saying that I do not intend to threaten lawyers in the way that my hon. and learned Friend describes. [Interruption.] I hear it said that I should read my Shakespeare; I shall go back and do that, having read my Dickens when I was dealing with earlier legislation. I can assure him that we do not threaten what he describes. The consultation period on the White Paper, prior to introducing the legislation—I hope that we will do that at the end of the year—will provide an opportunity to consult those who are most deeply involved.

Points of Order

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice on a very serious matter: how can Members of Parliament protect a civil servant who has been penalised as a result of sending to a Member an e-mail alerting them to potential inaccuracies in a ministerial statement? Last week, the British consul in Bucharest, a career civil servant, was suspended for sending me just such an e-mail from his home address. Is it not the case that disciplining civil servants for talking to Members of the House of Commons is a breach of privilege?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The right hon. Gentleman appears to be raising a complaint of privilege rather than a point of order. Privilege issues should be raised in writing with Mr. Speaker, so that he can give them proper consideration. If the right hon. Gentleman sends Mr. Speaker a letter setting out the full circumstances about which he is complaining, Mr. Speaker will give the matter his attention and respond as appropriate.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will know that Mr. Speaker has frequently ruled from the Chair that hon. Members should give warning of visits to one another's constituencies, and I think that most hon. Members on both sides of the House follow that convention. However, within the past couple of weeks, the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), the shadow Secretary of State for Health, has visited St. George's hospital in my constituency without giving any warning, and I still have not received any kind of written explanation. It also seems that the Tories locally are using St. George's as a political football by claiming that there is a definitive plan to close the hospital, which is not the case. There is a consultation on the hospital, and I am contributing to it, but it sounds to me as though they are using scare tactics. Will you comment on that convention, and confirm that it is the convention that right hon. and hon. Members should warn Members representing neighbouring constituencies or any other Members about visits to their constituencies?

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. If I have caused any upset to the hon. Gentleman, I apologise. For the record, so far as I was concerned, I was visiting Oldchurch hospital in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Rosindell) and undertaking a private party engagement in Hornchurch, during the course of which I did indeed comment on the subject of St. George's hospital, but undertook no official engagement there. [Interruption.] I did indeed talk about St. George's hospital while I was in Hornchurch. As the hon. Gentleman knows well, I combined that with a private engagement in Hornchurch, visiting my parents. Of course, I shall take care to tell him whenever I visit my parents in future.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will be very aware that the last crash at Heathrow landed in my constituency—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I wish first to respond to the previous points of order.

I can only reiterate what Mr. Speaker has said: clearly, there are common courtesies of this House whereby right hon. and hon. Members should inform the Member whose constituency they are visiting of that visit. Mr. Speaker has also suggested that these matters are perhaps best dealt with between the Members concerned. I hope that all Members will observe the common courtesies of this House.

Mr. Wilshire: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker; I thought that you had decided that silence was the best way of dealing with the last matter.

As I was saying, you will be aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the last crash at Heathrow landed in my constituency, and that the mortars that were fired into Heathrow were fired from my constituency. I am sure that you can therefore imagine how deeply alarmed many of my constituents were at the weekend at the story about Heathrow being identified as a primary al-Qaeda target. In the circumstances, I wonder whether Mr. Speaker has received any request from a Minister to make a statement that would reassure my constituents that everything is being done to ensure that they are as safe as possible?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Much as I would like to reassure the hon. Gentleman's constituents, I do not think that Mr. Speaker has received any such request, which is not strictly a point of order for the Chair.

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill

Lords message considered [25 March]

Clause 1

5.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with Lords amendment 1F to Commons amendment 1C.

I can barely believe that, despite the House of Commons reaching a strong view on so many occasions and so frequently expressing its opinion, we are still being told by the Conservative and Liberal majority in the House of Lords that it knows better than the House of Commons when it comes to elections policy. In its latest amendment, the other place suggests that we should not proceed with all-postal voting in four regions, which the Government announced on 21 January. On this occasion, the other place wants to leave out the north-west of England for a variety of inexplicable reasons, and I urge the House to reject that suggestion and to stand firm with our decided view that we want four regions in those pilots.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Will the Minister confirm that a decision to conduct three rather than four pilots would be welcomed by the Electoral Commission, which has made it plain over the past few days that perhaps Yorkshire and Humber should be conceded, but not the north-west?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman has moved his position from previous occasions. He should know that, in our democracy, it is this House, acting on the advice of Ministers, that makes final decisions when it comes to elections policy. We take advice from the Electoral Commission and hear what it has to say, but at the end of the day—that day ended some time ago—Parliament has the right to take a firm decision.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the potential for fraud is the major reason why Liberal peers oppose the north-west being involved in the postal ballot? Can he explain why Liberal Democrat peers are happy to have a postal vote in a referendum, but are not happy to have one for local and European elections?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend looks for logic in the Opposition parties' thinking, but their rationale is not apparent. Hon. Members will be astonished by the history of how we are here today. The Government decided to go with four regions on 21 January, and the House of Commons ratified that decision on 8 March. The House of Commons reconfirmed that decision on 16 March, and reiterated it only last week on 24 March, but here we are again.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): All the time that we still have a second chamber—I believe that it is still Government policy to allow us a second chamber—its views should be taken seriously and there should be give and take. The second chamber has given up its insistence on two pilots; why can the Minister not give up his insistence on four pilots and reach a sensible compromise?

Mr. Leslie: It is true that the other place has powers to revise and amend legislation, and, as we heard last week, noble Lords are experienced and often speak with authority. In this case, however, the other place's powers are being abused by the Opposition parties in their pursuit of overturning the will of the Government and the House of Commons. There comes a point when revision and amendment become obstructive and vexatious. This is not real scrutiny, but a brazen attempt by the Conservatives and the Liberals actively to prevent people in the north-west from having convenient voting mechanisms in the European and local elections.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that his case is fatally undermined by the fact that, as recently as 16 December, he said in this House—not once, twice or three times, but about six times—that the Government intended to have three pilots? The other place has reluctantly conceded three pilots. The Government, under huge pressure from the Deputy Prime Minister, have changed their mind and are seeking to insist on four. His own colleagues have fatally undermined the Minister.

Mr. Leslie: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have been discussing this since 21 January, when the Government made it absolutely clear that we wanted four regions: the east midlands, the north-east, the north-west, and Yorkshire and Humber. It is important that we proceed with all-postal voting in four regions, and I shall tell him why. We already know about the difficulties with turnout, not least in local and European elections, and it is important to ensure that we can respond with modern electoral mechanisms. We also know that all-postal voting is popular and convenient among the public, which is proved by the fact that it usually results in a rise in turnout of at least 10 per cent. We know that the resources are there for pilots in four regions, and if we can afford to go ahead, there is no reason why we should not do so.

Most importantly, we know that regional returning officers in all four regions are keen that all-postal voting should proceed; indeed, they perceive several risks in not proceeding. In correspondence with me and my Department, they have expressed worry that the delays and uncertainty created by the other place have cast a blight on their planning and preparations, because they find it difficult to proceed while there is no legislative clarity.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that over the past few weeks the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has been taking evidence on all-postal vote elections. When returning officers from Yorkshire gave evidence, they made it clear that any attempt to reverse the all-postal ballot proposals would make it virtually impossible for them to reorganise their arrangements. If that is true for Yorkshire, it must be true for the north-west as well.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend makes a salient point. I have heard that many of the suppliers and contractors who normally engage with returning officers are worried that, if this uncertainty continues, via the obstruction by Opposition parties, they may not be able to proceed.

New ward boundaries have been introduced in many metropolitan areas following boundary reviews, and returning officers may well find it difficult to locate local polling stations within them. That could prove particularly difficult if the north-west is forced by the amendment to go back to conventional systems. Those returning officers would have to find the staff to ensure that the polling stations could run efficiently. There are all sorts of reasons why effectively forcing the north-west to go back on what was planned and return to the conventional system would create difficulties. It would be irresponsible for Opposition parties to force that situation.

Mr. Hawkins: Should not returning officers have to wait until the legislation is on the statute book? If they are behaving as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) suggests, they are mistaken. They should wait until the legislation is in its final form, not jump the gun because they are under pressure from party political views expressed by Government Members.

5.30 pm

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman knows that we have been trying to resolve the matter for far longer than he suggests. If we had been able to resolve it far sooner, returning officers would not be asking questions about uncertainty. We have always been keen to ensure swift enactment of the measure but the Opposition parties' abuse of the powers of the other place has caused uncertainty. I hope that they will stop using the other place improperly to obstruct the Bill, allow its passage to continue and permit resolution so that four regions can be selected.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend believe it reasonable for returning officers in the north-west to assume that, once the House of Commons has said that the region should be one of the postal vote pilots, they can plan on that basis, rather than assuming that the House of Lords will kibosh the whole thing?

Mr. Leslie: As my hon. Friend says, an almost unprecedented constitutional situation is developing. There has been a significant amount of ping-pong between the two Houses on previous legislation, but the House of Lords rarely stands in the way of the will of the House of Commons, especially on elections policy. The root cause is clear: Conservative and Liberal peers have been instructed by their respective Front Benchers to use the revising powers of the other place to try to scupper legislation whenever the bandwagon appears and the opportunity arises. That could be their motivation for standing in the way of the north-west, especially, having more convenient voting mechanisms.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): May I take my hon. Friend back to the letter that Sam Younger sent him on 4 March? The nub of the matter appears to be that the Electoral Commission said:

"the rollout of all postal elections needs to be underpinned by a more robust statutory framework."

What can my hon. Friend say to reassure me and others that that robust framework exists so that people who ask about fraud are satisfied that it will not happen under the new system?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right that we support piloting all-postal arrangements and that, as the Electoral Commission suggested, before we have a wider roll-out for local government elections nationwide, there may need to be changes to individual registration and so on. However, in the interim, it is important to begin to scale up the piloting of all-postal arrangements. There has been considerable piloting of all-postal arrangements in previous local elections. If we were not allowed to proceed with four regions, fewer people would vote on an all-postal basis than in 2003. That would not be scaling up, but scaling back and it would be perceived as a backward step.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I fear that, in the course of a short speech, the Minister has already contradicted himself. He said that the other place was guilty of a procedural impropriety but went on to refer to its use of revising powers. He knows perfectly well that the other place has those powers and it has simply had the temerity, in his view, to use them. Why does not he admit that the real sin of the other place is to disagree with him?

Mr. Leslie: The shadow Secretary of State for International Development is wrong on that point. As I said earlier, it is not simply a matter of a disagreement between the two Houses. The House of Commons made its view known on 8 March, reiterated it on 16 March, did so again on 24 March and here we are again. I hope that my hon. Friends will support the motion to dis[illegible] and that we will again reiterate the strong view of the elected House of Commons. If the hon. Gentleman is willing to say that there is no Conservative Whip—and no Liberal Democrat Whip—in the other place to thwart the will of the House of Commons in our democratic decision about elections policy, I shall be happy to give way to him. However, I suspect that there is a Whip because the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties are pursuing a partisan motivation, on which I shall expand shortly. Will he say, on behalf of the shadow Secretaries of States, that there is no Whip?

Mr. Bercow: The Minister elevates me beyond all reasonable heights of my ambition. He ought to know that whipping is not a matter for me; I am just a humble shadow Secretary of State for International Development.

Mr. Leslie: I agree that the hon. Gentleman is indeed a humble shadow Secretary of State.

What are the true reasons behind the Conservative and Liberal opposition, particularly to the north-west? As I have said, their motivation could well be simply scuppering legislation opportunistically. They may well not want a higher turnout in the local and European elections in the north-west of England. There is certainly no evidence that all-postal elections are any more prone to fraud than conventional elections, not least because there have been no convictions for fraud in all-postal elections in the north-west. I know that some noble Lords have referred to certain anecdotes, but they related particularly to the conventional system of election, which suggests that other problems, not associated with all-postal voting, might well be at the root of the issue.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The Minister does a disservice to the other place, given the Electoral Commission's advice to the Government. Some of us have just come from Committee Room 11, where we have been considering the draft European Parliament orders. In that context, the Government have accepted in full the Electoral Commission's advice on constituency sizes. In one sphere, the Government accept that the commission's judgment is right and proper, but they reject it when it relates to the best way to conduct pilots.

Mr. Leslie: If the hon. Gentleman's policy is always to adhere to the advice of the Electoral Commission, why did his colleague agree in an earlier debate to reinstitute the declaration of identity provision—the witness signature provision—against the advice of the commission? That was the subject of a Liberal Democrat amendment in the other place. It suits the Liberal Democrats to adhere to the commission's advice when they want to, but not when they do not. We have to consider the motivation of the Opposition parties for using the powers of the other place to thwart the decisions of the House of Commons.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Is not the real impropriety the fact that the House of Lords is engaged in these actions on a time-limited piece of legislation? This is not a Bill that could come in next year or the year after; it is specifically time limited. That means that the Lords are abusing the convention of the House that they will deal with their business in a timely fashion. This could only have been considered timely if it had already been dealt with by now, because returning officers have to make decisions.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend could well be right. There are significant risks and dangers involved in the games being played by the Opposition parties. The returning officers in the north-west could face difficulties if those parties force them to go back on what they are already planning, and to return to conventional elections. We know for a fact that returning officers now want to proceed with all-postal voting. I hope that the Opposition parties will not leave the north-west in the lurch by forcing it to go back on its plans. There are significant dangers in going down that route. We know that there are significant benefits associated with all-postal voting, and that there are dangers associated with preventing such voting, particularly in the north-west. It is right for us to proceed with all-postal voting in those four regions, and I urge the House to disagree with the Lords in their amendment.

Mr. Hawkins: Every time the Minister gets to his feet and speaks in a polite and moderate tone of voice, as he always does, I become more and more convinced that he believes in the elected dictatorship of a one-party state. He speaks about the House of Commons as though there were cross-party agreement here on this issue, but we and the Liberal Democrats in both Houses have always opposed the Government's proposals. Moreover, the Government have changed their mind. Until 16 December last year, they made it clear that they intended to have only three all-postal pilots. They could have three all-postal pilots—reluctantly conceded recently by the other place—if they wanted them now, but we see in this the heavy hand of the Deputy Prime Minister, who was bellowing at us from the Treasury Bench when we debated these measures the time before last and who is obsessed with having all-postal pilots in all the Labour heartlands for party political advantage to fit in with what he wants for the referendums later in the year.

The game was given away just before what I might describe as round 7 of this heavyweight contest by a written answer in last Thursday's Hansard from the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Corby (Phil Hope), at the same time as the other place was about to debate the matter for the umpteenth time. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) asked:

"To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he last met members or officials of the Electoral Commission; what the purpose of that meeting was; and what the outcome was."

The junior Minister, who was on the Treasury Bench a little earlier, gave this answer, which I can describe only as containing terminological inexactitude:

"My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister met with members of the Electoral Commission on 3 March to discuss issues relating to the piloting of all-postal voting at the European Parliamentary and combined local elections in June, including how many regions should be involved."

This is where it becomes rather more serious, because it continues:

"Both parties agreed that the regions that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister announced should use all-postal voting this year are each capable of running a successful pilot."—[Official Report, 24 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 909W.]

Since that meeting on 3 March, to which that answer refers, we have had not one but two letters to the Government. Despite my challenges last time we debated these measures and the time before, we have not seen the letters from Ministers to the Electoral Commission. I again challenge the Minister to put those letters, as well as minutes of all meetings that he, other Ministers or the Deputy Prime Minister have had with the Electoral Commission, in the Library of the House. Three times at the Dispatch Box I have asked him to do so, but each time his response has been silence.

We know from both the Electoral Commission's replies that that answer from the hon. Member for Corby does not reflect what the Electoral Commission says. As we debated last week, and as has been set out in this place and the other place, the Electoral Commission, as recently as 23 March, said:

"The considerations as set out in our December Report regarding the North West have not changed".

The Electoral Commission sets out in detail in its report why it regards the north-west as unsuitable, and it has not changed its mind. In addition, the Electoral Commission goes on in that letter to say:

"For the reasons set out in my letter of 4 March"— that is, the letter sent after that meeting—

"we are not persuaded of the merits of piloting in 4 regions."

The Electoral Commission is still saying three regions and not the north-west. It has put compelling reasons why, and noble lords and baronesses in another place have set out convincing reasons why the north-west should not be chosen.

The Government are obsessed with adding the north-west, which they originally intended not to do, and this Minister said not once or twice but about six times that the Government wanted three pilot regions. They want to add the north-west for their party political advantage and because the Deputy Prime Minister is obsessed by it.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): I fear that the hon. Gentleman has misrepresented the Electoral Commission's position. It said in its report that the north-west was potentially suitable. May I challenge him on this? Two weeks ago at the Dispatch Box, he made allegations of wholesale fraud—that is the phrase that he used—in the north-west. He referred specifically to the remarks of Lord Greaves and asked us to look them up, which I did. Is he aware that a report by Lancashire constabulary on those allegations found no evidence whatever of wrongdoing and that the file is closed? Does not his case against the north-west collapse due to that revelation?

Mr. Hawkins: No, it does not. I heard Lord Greaves giving an interview on national radio after our debates last week, as I was driving back to my constituency. He has not changed his mind at all, and he was debating the issues with the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). The Electoral Commission is saying that it has not changed its reasons, which were given on 23 March. It has not changed its view on the north-west; the views of the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) are undermined by the Electoral Commission, which his Government set up.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): My hon. Friend may already be aware as a result of the revelation from the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) that a statutory instrument has recently been discussed Upstairs that would reduce the number of MEPs in this country. The Government accepted in its entirety the Electoral Commission's recommendation on that. When we asked the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), who is currently on the Treasury Bench, why the Government accepted its recommendation in that respect but not in this one, he said that the two were different. Would my hon. Friend like to speculate on what the difference is?

5.45 pm

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend is right, and I suspect that the difference is accounted for by the obsessions of the Deputy Prime Minister and the party political advantage of the Government party.

Chris Bryant: The whole tenor of the hon. Gentleman's argument seems to be that the Deputy Prime Minister is trying to make sure that there is a postal ballot in Labour heartlands, because that will give party advantage to the Labour party. The strongest Labour heartland is Wales, which has not a single Tory representative in this House. If the hon. Gentleman's argument were true, surely Wales would be included in the pilot.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman has not played much of a part in our many earlier deliberations on the Bill. Had he done so, he would have known that we debated extensively Wales and Scotland, and many of his hon. Friends from Scotland were—and, I imagine, still are—outraged that Scotland has not been included. They were not included because the Electoral Commission specifically recommended against them, in even stronger terms than it did against the north-west.

Labour Members have this problem: they set up the Electoral Commission, and they are now picking and choosing only those recommendations that suit them. The biggest weakness in the Government's case is that the Government said originally—not once, not twice, but many times, through this Minister—that they intended only three electoral pilots. They were put out because the Electoral Commission originally recommended only two. They said that they would go ahead with a third. Only recently have they started to become obsessed with a fourth.

The Minister has also been trying to rewrite the history of the battles between the two Chambers of this bicameral legislature. He sought to suggest that there is something unusual about ping-pong, as it is called, between the two Houses. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and I are well aware, that has happened towards the end of a legislative period pretty well every year since this Government came to power. Only last year, we were debating the Criminal Justice Bill, which was going backwards and forwards between the two Houses until the Government were forced to give way at the last minute, with ill grace, on the last day of the Session. I suspect that that will happen in this case. Just as we come to the Easter recess, the Government will be forced to go back to what the Electoral Commission recommends, and accept that the other place and the Electoral Commission are right. That is why we will stick to our guns, and the other place should stick to its guns.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): It is a few weeks since I spoke in any debate in relation to this Bill, although I listened to the last such debate. The last time that I spoke was on 8 March. The Opposition's arguments against including the north-west are those that they used against Yorkshire and Humber. We also found out, of course, that Yorkshire and Humber was included in the Opposition amendment in the other place last week. There is a lot of hypocritical talk in this Chamber about what the intentions of the other place are.

I told the House on 8 March why I support the Bill and why all-postal ballots are good for democracy. They increase participation and I doubt whether they affect the result. They did not affect the result in my constituency last year, but 53 per cent. of people turning out is a lot better than 23 per cent. That example came from my constituency.

Looking at the debate in the other place last week, there can be no doubt that the whole issue relates to party politics. My hon. Friend the Minister passed some comment about the official Opposition. Reading the debate, I do not put a lot of the problem down to the major Opposition party, because it does not seem to know what is taking place most of the time. All that it knows is when to support the amendments tabled by a minor Opposition party, the Liberal Democrats. That is when they all pile into the Division Lobbies, and that is why we have ended up in this position on—I think—three occasions.

No one reading reports of debates on the Bill, especially debates in the other place, could doubt that this is about Liberal Democrat party politics relating not to Yorkshire and Humberside, the east midlands or the north-east, but to the north-west. I said that on 8 March, and it has been reaffirmed at least twice since then, when Members of the other place have sought to table amendments opposing the Bill.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): I have looked at some of the figures and tried to draw conclusions from them. The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) spoke of parliamentary ping-pong, and that is what we have seen since the Government came to power in 1997 on, to the best of my knowledge, 13 occasions, involving 13 Bills that this Labour Government have tried to pass. Between 1979 and 1997, the other place tried to frustrate this House on three occasions. That tells its own story. Nor should my hon. Friend forget the role of the Cross Benchers, who have supported the Tories in 80 per cent. of cases.

Mr. Barron: Perhaps my hon. Friend feels that Cross Benchers in the other place are not so independent of party politics in that respect. I shall keep my view of the other place out of the debate.

This is all about Liberal Democrats and the north-west. I shall now address myself to the only two Liberal Democrats in the Chamber, the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith). I have said this repeatedly. I said it on 8 March, and it has been said before. Last week Lord Rennard said that the issue was,

> "I think, a very principled one—that no one party should choose different voting mechanisms for different places according to its own interest, based in this case on fears that the electorate will not turn out to support it."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 March 2004; Vol. 659, c. 851.]

Let me tell both Liberal Democrats that I would think that disgraceful if it came from anyone involved in elective politics, but I can accept such views from people next door who have never been involved in elective politics, or have been involved only in elective politics that have failed. I do not think that they understand the issue: I do not think they understand what our democracy is about. I am not a mechanistic democrat, but I think that those who deny—knowingly—that they would prefer a 20 per cent. turnout to one of 40 or 50 per cent. do a disservice to local government and the European electorate, and to democracy. I believe that they are doing it on behalf of the Liberal Democrats in the north-west, and that they should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Redwood: It is true that postal ballots increase turnout, so why have the Government not proposed universal postal ballots for this election?

Mr. Barron: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we are talking about a pilot. We have had this debate time and again. On 8 March he intervened on me to say that he was not so sure about postal ballots. He said:

"such a widespread experiment cannot proceed until the real issues of impersonation, pressure and fraud are dealt with."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1308.]

As I said then, most of the arguments against an all-postal ballot for any one, three or four regions could be used to oppose postal ballots in general.

I have seen this in action in a small way. I think that participation is good and healthy, and I do not think that one political party will be affected more than another. In our last debate, I said that if the tide was against a political party, it would drown more quickly. That is especially true if the tide is stronger than usual.

All the ping-pong is wrong. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) said that the other place had challenged this House three times between 1979 and 1997. When I was elected in 1983, it was felt that a big majority was unhealthy and bad for democracy. I cannot remember the other place challenging that Government. It was all about party politics then, and we heard about not frustrating the will of the people. It seems to me that in considering this Bill, we could frustrate the will of the people.

I do not know whether Ministers agree with my analysis, but my answer to the questions "Why today?" and "Why the north-west?" would be this. It is simple and logical to involve the north-west in June, because we all know that in October the north-west will vote in an all-postal ballot on whether to have a regional assembly. One thing that can be said of the logic is that it is consistent with what the Electoral Commission has said many times. Playing the hokey-cokey by having all-postal votes and then returning to the old system will denigrate electoral politics in this country, and be bad for turnouts. That is what Opposition Members and those in the other place propose, and they are wrong.

Mr. Heath: Welcome to Groundhog Day, Madam Deputy Speaker. We are going through all the same arguments in the same way, with no more clarity or logic than before.

The right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) may find this odd, but I agreed with a great deal of what he said. He suggested that encouraging more people to vote was a good thing; I agree. He said that all-postal ballots appeared, on the basis of the evidence so far, to increase the number of votes; I agree. He said that it was right to organise pilot schemes so that we could assess how we might expand the process; I agree. He said that he did not believe that the democratic outcome of the elections would be affected; I agree, on the basis of the evidence that we have seen so far. He said that it was wrong for areas that had already had all-postal ballots to be prevented from having them this year. That is exactly the position in which my constituents will find themselves as a result of the Bill, which he supports. It will make it illegal for them to have an all-postal ballot in the European elections and the local authority elections in June. They had one last time because my Liberal Democrat-controlled authority allowed the Government's interests to be met.

There is much on which the right hon. Gentleman and I agree; where we disagree is on the fundamental issue of who makes the recommendations on which we reach our decisions. We have said all along that we should use the Electoral Commission as an independent arbiter because that is safest in a democratic society.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: Not yet; the hon. Gentleman can intervene when he has listened to my argument.

The safest option is for us to use the independent arbiter established by the Government, unless there are strong reasons for ignoring its advice. It would have to involve a consensus extending beyond any single party in this House. Our position has been consistent. When the Electoral Commission said that it could positively recommend only two regions, we said, "Fair enough—two regions will be involved." When it reviewed the situation and said that it could accept a third region, Yorkshire and Humberside, we went along with that and, in another place, tabled an amendment to extend the range of the scheme.

Mr. Barron: My simple question is whether, if the Electoral Commission said that the electoral returning officer in the north-west should go ahead with a pilot there, the hon. Gentleman would believe that there should be a pilot in the north-west. That is the opposite argument to that used by his noble Friends in the other place.

Mr. Heath: That is precisely not the case. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that when we last debated this issue the question was that the pilot areas should comprise those that the Electoral Commission could positively recommend, with no stipulation about how many there should be. The Government rejected that option and he voted against it, as he was not prepared to accept it.

Andy Burnham: Does the fact that the Electoral Commission made a firm recommendation on two regions and said that others were potentially suitable not suggest to the hon. Gentleman that it was inviting the Government to make recommendations on which further regions should be included?

Mr. Heath: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has by now read the most recent letter from the Electoral Commission, which makes it quite clear that that is not what it said. The commission said that it could not positively recommend the other regions, and it placed in third position, as runner up, Scotland, whose merits the Government have not for one moment appeared to consider. Instead, they have chosen two other regions.

Mr. Russell Brown rose—

Mr. Heath: I shall not give way, because I should like to make a little more progress.

An important constitutional matter is involved in this debate. Much play has been made of the fact that this is an example of the unelected House acting as a block on the settled will of the elected House. Setting aside for the moment the fact that some of us strongly believe that the other place should not be an unelected House and are waiting rather impatiently for the Government to do something about that rather than simply wringing their hands because the Prime Minister will not agree with his party on the subject, do we not have to consider the basic constitutional issue that the almost paramount duty of the other place in a bicameral system is to protect our constitutional arrangements if they are under threat of abuse? If a future Government decided, on their own majority and without the support of any Opposition parties, that they wished to abolish or postpone elections or change the voting system off their own bat, I hope that every single Labour Member would expect the Lords to take an interest in that and to protect the constitution of this country, unwritten though it is.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman think carefully about the problem facing all those who will have to administer the election in the north-west? If his proposals went through, they would have to have a traditional election in which a large number of people would apply for postal votes because they were angry—leading to an exceptionally high number of postal votes. To run the two systems together is particularly difficult for electoral officers, so would it not be sensible to accept one system? It will be implemented at the very last minute, and it should be a postal system.

Mr. Heath: We should not be in this position. The Government let the Bill lie on the Table for two months and did nothing with it. They then decided that everything had to be done in a hurry, and their position has become absurd. They jeopardised all the arrangements that returning officers have to make, including the printing of ballot papers. I am concerned about the Government's conduct.

Chris Bryant: May I return the hon. Gentleman to the point that he made a few moments ago? He asked what would happen if a Government proposed to suspend elections indefinitely or for a considerable period, but I am sure that he knows, because it is a piece of Liberal legislation, that the Parliament Act 1911 specifically recommends which systems arise if a Government want to change the date of a general election. That is clear. Surely, the point is that we need a new Parliament Act to legislate properly on arrangements between the other place and this Chamber. This ping-pong, which completely flouts the Salisbury convention, brings the whole parliamentary system into disrepute.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. For an intervention, that was an extremely long speech, and it took us further and further away from the narrower point that is at the heart of this matter.

Mr. Heath: I take your advice on that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The other place has not only a perfect right but a duty to lay a constraining hand on this House if a single party in it chooses to ignore the advice of the Electoral Commission and other parties represented in this Chamber. That is an important constitutional issue to which we must return at another stage.

What is so bizarre about the whole situation is that, as the Bill stands, the Government have what they asked for. It is like a toddler in a supermarket who says, "I want three lollies. I want three lollies". The sensible mother says, "No, you can have two lollies—the third would make you sick." The child throws all its toys out the pram and has an almighty tantrum, and eventually the parent reconsiders and says, "All right, all right; you can have three." What is the response of the toddler? He throws all his toys out the pram again and says, "I want four now. I want four. Three isn't good enough."

How can we deal with a Government who behave in that way? The Under-Secretary's embarrassment is palpable, because neither he nor the Lord Chancellor is running this show. How demeaning it is for the Lord Chancellor—the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs—to have his actions constrained by the Deputy Prime Minister. It is the Deputy Prime Minister who goes along to talk to the Electoral Commission. That is nothing to do with his brief, but he chooses to do so. He is the one who writes letters to the commission—nothing to do with him, but he does so. He is the one who sits in on our debates and makes absurd comments from a sedentary position. They are nothing to do with him, but he does so.

Mr. Leslie rose—

Mr. Heath: The Minister is going to say that he is not demeaned by that situation. He will have to give a pretty clear explanation of why not.

Mr. Leslie: The Deputy Prime Minister has responsibility for local government. The June elections are for local government seats, so surely it is right for the Deputy Prime Minister to take an interest in them. Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that the Deputy Prime Minister is elected, like all other Members in this House? Does the hon. Gentleman not see any virtue in the fact that we are elected, and should have our will and the decisions that we make in this House of Commons upheld?

Mr. Heath: We are the masters now. The Minister has official responsibility for electoral arrangements, yet another Department interferes in everything that he does and says that he cannot have what he originally asked for. That is not joined-up government; it is bullying by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Labour party for their own objectives. That is what we object to so strongly.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman's characterisation of the Minister's lickspittle conduct is extremely effective. Does he agree that the historical musings of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) about the Salisbury convention are wholly inapplicable in this case given the absence of a manifesto commitment? Does he recall that, on any of the three occasions during the Conservative government highlighted by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown), the Labour party complained about the behaviour of the upper House? I do not recall that.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman invites me to do two things. First, he invites me to engage in a discussion with the hon. Member for Rhondda that Mr. Deputy Speaker has said is beyond the scope of this debate, so I shall not do so. Secondly, he invites me to support the view that another place without an elected mandate ought to frustrate the will of this House when it considers matters other than the constitution and the protection of human rights and liberty, which I think are its proper province. I am not prepared to do that, because I want reform of the other place and will not defend its present arrangements.

I will, however, defend the right of another place, as constituted, to look dispassionately at legislation before it and to take a view—which is nothing to do with my arranging my troops at the other end. For heaven's sake, I could not even arrange my colleagues behind me. If more than one were here at the moment, I might try to do so.

I am not in a position to tell my colleagues in the other place how to vote; they will reach their own judgment. At the moment, their judgment is that the Government are engaged in a process of bullying and inappropriate action that is against all the tenets of our constitutional settlement, and they are right to take that view. I just wish that the Government would accept that they have the Bill that they asked for in the first place, and that they would please stop throwing their toys out of the pram, and behave like a grown-up Government.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I did not intend to speak in this debate, but I am moved to do so by some interesting distortions of the truth. I challenge any Member who served on the Standing Committee considering the Bill that gave birth to the Electoral Commission, or who participated in any of the subsequent stages, to tell me that any Member, at any stage, moved an amendment that sought to give the commission the power to instruct. [Interruption.] Stop chuntering over there! That never happened, and it was never the intention of this House—or of the upper House, so far as I can see—that the commission be given a power to instruct. It is there to give advice, and advice it has given—to the Government and to this House.

Sir Robert Smith: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should have been present in Committee Room 11, where the Minister said that the Government were taking instructions from the commission in respect of electoral boundaries because they were required to do so by European legislation. So it has already been stated in legislation that the commission should be supreme, and that it should be obeyed when giving advice in this area. We are saying that when such advice is given, it should be taken extremely seriously.

Mr. Miller: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the subject of boundaries, but it has nothing to do with the procedural process.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said that the Lords have a duty to protect the constitution. There is one fundamental and overriding constitutional point that must take precedence over all else: that only one House is elected. We have yet to have in its entirety the debate on the nature of the second Chamber, what its powers ought ultimately to be, and whether, indeed, it should even exist. A few Members present voted for its abolition—[Interruption.] I hear some cheers from behind me. At this point the second Chamber has no ability constitutionally to put aside the powers of this House.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) hinted, the Conservatives are riding on the coat-tails of the Liberal Democrats—in this Chamber, in the upper House and, indeed, in the north-west. They have no policy of their own. They are looking for convenient electoral gain, and they seek to achieve it through a mechanism that would minimise turnout.

Mr. Borrow: Does my hon. Friend find it extraordinary that not a single north-west Liberal Democrat Member is in the Chamber to explain why they are preventing their constituents from voting by post in June?

Mr. Miller: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point, and what my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley said was spot on. At local government level, Liverpool city council seems terrified of the concept of higher turnout. In what better place could we campaign for higher turnout than in Liverpool, where, regrettably, turnout has been far too low for many years? So far as Liverpool city council is concerned, the Liberal Democrats are frightened of a higher turnout.

6.15 pm

Andy Burnham: We are probably 10 weeks away from the elections. Does my hon. Friend agree that the most important voices now belong not to those in this Chamber or in the one down the Corridor, or to those in the Electoral Commission, but to the returning officers in the north-west and the regional returning officer? According to my information, they are all in favour of postal voting going ahead.

Mr. Miller: My hon. Friend makes a very strong point and any right-thinking person will agree with him, but that does not mean that he will get unanimous support in this Chamber.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome on distancing himself last week from the outrageous statement of the Liberal Democrat Member of the European Parliament, Mr. Chris Davies, that people who want postal voting are lazy. Why does the hon. Gentleman not demonstrate his anger at that statement by voting with us tonight?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Before making one or two brief points, I should point out to the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) that elevating paid officials—the electoral registration officers—above Members of either House is rather strange parliamentary logic.

The other place has as much right to take the stand that it has taken on this issue as it had to throw out Mrs. Thatcher's War Crimes Bill. One should remind Labour Members that the House of Lords has behaved with a degree of vigour and robustness, no matter which party has been in government. All that it is seeking to do on this occasion is to look properly at what the Electoral Commission is recommending. No matter what sophistry Labour Members indulge in, the fact is that the commission has said that it does not believe that there should be a pilot in the north-west.

Andy Burnham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Not yet. The commission's statement is a fact, whatever arguments Labour Members might advance and whatever the Minister might say. Indeed, he has changed his mind, as my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) pointed out. The Minister took one line in December and is now taking a very different one—although, admittedly, he has taken it for the past eight weeks. In taking that very different line, he is flying in the face of the commission's advice. This House is right to listen to that advice, and it would be far better advised to say, "Let us have three pilots," which would constitute a concession on the part of many. Frankly, I would rather have no pilots at all. I do not like the idea of compulsory postal voting, but I recognise the fact that the commission has been asked to make some recommendations, and that the figure of two pilots has been increased to three. However, I recognise—I ask the Minister to do likewise—that the commission does not believe that the north-west should have a compulsory postal ballot.

Andy Burnham rose—

Sir Patrick Cormack: Whatever the hon. Gentleman might say, he cannot change that fact. The advice is clear and unequivocal, in letters from the chairman of the commission, Mr. Sam Younger. It is a great pity that Mr. Younger, in whom I have great confidence, has been placed in this extremely difficult and embarrassing position.

Mr. Redwood: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Patrick Cormack: I shall certainly give way to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend not think that the Minister should apologise to the commission and to the returning officers who have been left in muddle, owing to this Government's delay and bungling?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Not for the first time, I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend, whose reputation for incisive sagacity is exceeded by no one. Mr. Sam Younger and his colleagues, who seek to serve this country and the electoral system with objective, impartial advice, should receive an apology. We are now moving, because of the ridiculous timing—

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Employment Relations Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 4

DISAPPLICATION OF QUALIFYING PERIOD AND UPPER AGE LIMIT FOR UNFAIR DISMISSAL

'For section 154 of the 1992 Act substitute—

"154 Disapplication of qualifying period and upper age limit for unfair dismissal Sections 108(1) and 109(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (qualifying period and upper age limit for unfair dismissal protection) do not apply to a dismissal which by virtue of section 152 or 153 is regarded as unfair for the purposes of Part 10 of that Act.".'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

6.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 15—Burden of proof on employer to show reason for dismissal in trade union related cases—

'(1) Section 154 of the 1992 Act (exclusion of requirement as to qualifying period, etc) is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (2) insert—

"(3) On a complaint under section 152 or section 153 it shall be for the employer to show the reason (or, if more than one, the principal reason) for the dismissal.".'.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Both new clauses relate to protections provided for by section 152 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992 against dismissal on grounds of trade union membership or activities. Section 153 of the 1992 Act provides similar protections against being unfairly selected for redundancy on grounds of trade union membership or activities.

Currently, those important protections apply to all employees. In other words, the usual qualifying period of one year's service for bringing an unfair dismissal application does not apply in those cases. The usual upper age limit for unfair dismissal does not apply either. The disapplication of the qualifying period and the upper age limit is achieved by section 154 of the 1992 Act. It works by disapplying the qualifying period and the upper age limit "if it is shown" that the sole or principal reason for dismissal, or selecting the employee for redundancy, was an inadmissible reason under section 152 of the 1992 Act.

The protections against dismissal on trade union-related grounds are long-standing rights. Indeed, they were among the first "day one" employment rights ever introduced, in the mid-1970s. Perhaps as a result, the language used in section 154 to disapply the qualifying period and upper age limit is peculiar to that section. It has not been followed by later provisions that have created day-one rights against unfair dismissal on other grounds.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

The wording of section 154 has caused problems. It has been interpreted by the courts as placing the onus on the employee that is complaining of unfair dismissal and who has under a year's service, to show that the employer's decision in dismissing him was taken for an inadmissible trade union reason. In other words, the burden of proof is on the employee to show the employer's reason for dismissal. That is intrinsically difficult for the employee to do, given his lack of detailed knowledge of the employer's behaviours and motivations. That approach contrasts sharply with all other cases of unfair dismissal where the burden of proof is on the employer to show the reason for the dismissal.

In other words, the peculiar wording of section 154 has created an anomaly. Indeed, the burden of proof would vary where two employees—one with more than 12 months' service and the other with six months' service—complained of being dismissed for belonging to a trade union. In the first case, the burden of proof would rest on the employer and in the second it would rest on the employee. There are no justifiable reasons for such differential treatment. It is basically an accident of history.

New clause 4 will rectify the anomaly by replacing the current version of section 154 with a new one that uses different wording drawn from other day-one rights to disapply the qualifying period and upper age limit. The new wording ensures that the burden of showing what the reason for dismissal was will now rest on the employer.

New clause 15 also attempts to rectify that anomaly by inserting a new subsection into section 154 that provides that the burden of proof for the reason for the dismissal is on the employer. It does not, however, replace the "it is shown" wording that has caused difficulties for the courts. For that reason, the wording of new clause 4 is to be preferred.

The number of individuals affected by the change is small. I am glad to say that cases of alleged dismissal on trade union grounds are few, but that is no reason why we should leave the current imperfect wording of section 154 as it is.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): As the Minister pointed out, the new clause reverses the burden of proof and we do not necessarily have any difficulty with that, but we are very unhappy at the complete lack of consultation on the new clause with any of the key bodies.

The Minister said that the so-called anomaly dated back to 1992, and if his legal advice has persuaded him that there is indeed an anomaly he is right to correct it. However, although there has been a lot of consultation on the Bill—it was published a long, long time ago and there have been various White Papers and endless discussions with organisations and bodies—most of the employer organisations did not see the new clauses until today. The Government tabled the new clauses only on Wednesday and did not tell those organisations, so they had only two and a bit working days to discover that the provisions had been tabled, which is not good enough.

The Minister made great play of the fact that the Bill was about partnership and that there was a consensus-building process. He talked about always getting everybody on board and discussing things with all parties and when we began our consideration of the Bill the atmosphere was reasonably positive, because everyone felt that they had been consulted. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) pointed out, the Government are hanging new provisions on this measure as though it were a Christmas tree. Such provisions could do not only positive things, as the Minister claims for the new clause, but many other things. The Minister told us not to panic because the Government would do nothing that was untoward or would break the spirit of consensus built up with the various organisations, yet unfortunately that is exactly what has happened.

We are not especially enamoured of the changing of the burden of proof under new clause 4. As the Minister explains, it will be up to the employer to show that it was not trade union activity or involvement that led to either discipline or dismissal. He claims that there is an anomaly, but any change in the burden of proof is a serious matter, as it is a precious component of our legal system. Why did the Government not consult the employer organisations? Why were they left in the dark until this morning? He has created much ill will owing not to the substance of the new clause and the other proposals but to the lack of consultation.

How many tribunal cases will be affected every year by the change in the burden of proof? That is a serious matter.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that when the Government make a superficially sensible proposal it is even more important to discuss it with those who have to deal with it? Although they think that they are producing something that will be very good, something might have been missed, which is why consultation is so important, even though most people might feel that the proposal seemed perfectly sensible.

Mr. Bellingham: My right hon. Friend is right. He brings a huge amount of experience to the discussion, having done an excellent job not only when he served in the Minister's place some years ago but in more senior positions. The key is consultation—working things out with the various organisations. It is obvious that lawyers for various trade unions have been pushing the matter, so will the Minister tell the House why he did not properly consult the Institute of Directors, the Engineering Employers Federation, the British Chambers of Commerce and the CBI?

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I welcome new clause 4, which is better worded than my proposed new clause 15. In the spirit of consensus, I merely point out that, in unfair dismissal cases that are trade union related, the new clause simply maintains consistency with other cases, where the burden of proof is with employers. It is on that basis that we should move forward. Whatever lack of consultation there may have been, there is general approval for such a provision and an awareness that it was required, especially since the case of Smith v. Hayle town council. It is an improvement in the law and should be greatly welcomed.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): In relation to the comments that have just been made, I merely point out that although new clause 15 includes the words, "After subsection (2) insert", section 154 of the 1992 Act does not have a subsection (2).

6.45 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am sorry that we have started off in a different vein from our time in Committee.

The point about consultation was well made. We want to hold full consultation with everybody who is affected by the Bill, but Members will be aware that we held an important debate about the Wilson and Palmer judgment and its effect in bringing about significant changes in the rights to trade union membership. That also relates to issues such as those dealt with by new clause 4. The provision is not a bauble on a Christmas tree, as the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) claimed earlier and during the debate on the programme motion last week. He ended his contribution to that debate by saying that he was not a happy camper, but I hope that we can make him a happy camper this evening by explaining that there were appropriate reasons for our proposals. A small number of tribunal cases are affected and I shall write to him with the number. In fact, we informed the CBI, the EEF and TUC that we would be tabling the provisions.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) for not pressing new clause 15. It is entirely sensible to put the burden of proof on employers for reasons that have been outlined and accepted, so I ask the House to accept the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

ADDITIONAL DUTIES ON EMPLOYERS INFORMED OF BALLOTS

'(1) Paragraph 26 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act (duties of employer informed of requirement to arrange ballot on recognition etc) is amended in accordance with subsections (2) to (4).

(2) In sub-paragraph (1) for "three" substitute "five".

(3) After sub-paragraph (4) insert—

"(4ZA) The fourth duty is to refrain from making any offer to any or all of the workers constituting the bargaining unit which—

(a) has or is likely to have the effect of inducing any or all of them not to attend any relevant meeting between the union (or unions) and the workers constituting the bargaining unit, and

(b) is not reasonable in the circumstances.

(4ZB) The fifth duty is to refrain from taking or threatening to take any action against a worker solely or mainly on the grounds that he—

(a) attended or took part in any relevant meeting between the union (or unions) and the workers constituting the bargaining unit, or

(b) indicated his intention to attend or take part in such a meeting.

(4ZC) A meeting is a relevant meeting in relation to a worker for the purposes of sub-paragraph (4ZA) and (4ZB) if—

(a) it is organised in accordance with any agreement reached concerning the second duty or as a result of a step ordered to be taken under paragraph 27 to remedy a failure to comply with that duty, and

(b) it is one which the employer is, by such an agreement or order as is mentioned in paragraph (a), required to permit the worker to attend.

(4ZD) Without prejudice to the generality of the second duty imposed by this paragraph, an employer is to be taken to have failed to comply with that duty if—

(a) he refuses a request for a meeting between the union (or unions) and any or all of the workers constituting the bargaining unit to be held in the absence of the employer or any representative of his (other than one who has been invited to attend the meeting) and it is not reasonable in the circumstances for him to do so,

(b) he or a representative of his attends such a meeting without having been invited to do so,

(c) he seeks to record or otherwise be informed of the proceedings at any such meeting and it is not reasonable in the circumstances for him to do so, or

(d) he refuses to give an undertaking that he will not seek to record or otherwise be informed of the proceedings at any such meeting unless it is reasonable in the circumstances for him to do either of those things.

(4ZE) The fourth and fifth duties do not confer any rights on a worker; but that does not affect any other right which a worker may have."

(4) For sub-paragraph (8) substitute—

"(8) Each of the powers specified in sub-paragraph (9) shall be taken to include power to issue Codes of Practice—

(a) about reasonable access for the purposes of sub-paragraph (3), and

(b) about the fourth duty imposed by this paragraph.

(9) The powers are—

(a) the power of ACAS under section 199(1);

(b) the power of the Secretary of State under section 203(1)(a)."

(5) In paragraph 27(1) of that Schedule (remedial order in case of employer's failure to comply with duties under paragraph 26) for "three duties imposed" substitute "duties imposed on him".

(6) Paragraph 118 of that Schedule (duties of employer informed of requirement to arrange ballot on derecognition etc) is amended in accordance with subsections (6) to (8).

(7) In sub-paragraph (1) for "three" substitute "five".

(8) After sub-paragraph (4) insert—

"(4A) The fourth duty is to refrain from making any offer to any or all of the workers constituting the bargaining unit which—

(a) has or is likely to have the effect of inducing any or all of them not to attend any relevant meeting between the union (or unions) and the workers constituting the bargaining unit, and

(b) is not reasonable in the circumstances.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

(4B) The fifth duty is to refrain from taking or threatening to take any action against a worker solely or mainly on the grounds that he—

(a) attended or took part in any relevant meeting between the union (or unions) and the workers constituting the bargaining unit, or

(b) indicated his intention to attend or take part in such a meeting.

(4C) A meeting is a relevant meeting in relation to a worker for the purposes of sub-paragraph (4A) and (4B) if—

(a) it is organised in accordance with any agreement reached concerning the second duty or as a result of a step ordered to be taken under paragraph 119 to remedy a failure to comply with that duty, and

(b) it is one which the employer is, by such an agreement or order as is mentioned in paragraph (a), required to permit the worker to attend.

(4D) Without prejudice to the generality of the second duty imposed by this paragraph, an employer is to be taken to have failed to comply with that duty if—

(a) he refuses a request for a meeting between the union (or unions) and any or all of the workers constituting the bargaining unit to be held in the absence of the employer or any representative of his (other than one who has been invited to attend the meeting) and it is not reasonable in the circumstances for him to do so,

(b) he or a representative of his attends such a meeting without having been invited to do so,

(c) he seeks to record or otherwise be informed of the proceedings at any such meeting and it is not reasonable in the circumstances for him to do so, or

(d) he refuses to give an undertaking that he will not seek to record or otherwise be informed of the proceedings at any such meeting unless it is reasonable in the circumstances for him to do either of those things.

(4E) The fourth and fifth duties do not confer any rights on a worker; but that does not affect any other right which a worker may have."

(9) For sub-paragraph (8) substitute—

"(8) Each of the powers specified in sub-paragraph (9) shall be taken to include power to issue Codes of Practice—

(a) about reasonable access for the purposes of sub-paragraph (3), and

(b) about the fourth duty imposed by this paragraph.

(9) The powers are—

(a) the power of ACAS under section 199(1);

(b) the power of the Secretary of State under section 203(1)(a)."

(10) In paragraph 119(1) of that Schedule (remedial order in case of employer's failure to comply with duties under paragraph 118) for "three duties imposed" substitute "duties imposed on him".'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 6—Unfair practices in relation to recognition ballots.

Government new clause 7—Unfair practices in relation to derecognition ballots.

Government new clause 8—Unfair practices: power to make provision about periods before notice of ballot.

New clause 2—Intimidation—

'After paragraph 51 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act insert—

"Intimidation

51A If during the union recognition procedure a union uses undue force or intimidating measures to get recognition then the CAC shall have the right to investigate this at the request of the employer or any worker and if such measures are found to have been used the CAC shall terminate the recognition procedure immediately.".'.

Government amendments Nos. 4 to 6.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The intimidation of workers during recognition and derecognition ballots has been repeatedly raised with the Government, both during the review of the Employment Relations Act 1999 and during the consideration of this Bill. Both unions and employers have brought to my attention cases of alleged intimidation and have called on the Government to act to prevent such behaviour.

At the last sitting of the Standing Committee, I gave notice of our intention to move these amendments on Report. This is undoubtedly a difficult aspect, and many issues had to be considered before we could table the amendments. It has inevitably taken some time to complete the process, which explains why we could not table them sooner.

Mr. Djanogly: In response to my question about this matter in Committee—I think that it was on 2 March—the Minister said that he would table a new clause shortly, so can he explain why we did not see it until late last week?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I have tried to outline the difficulties involved and I hope that when the hon. Gentleman has heard what I have to say he will accept the reasons.

The word "intimidation" covers a wide range of possible conduct, and new clauses 5, 6 and 7 deal with the main behaviours that cause offence, at the time when most intimidation is likely to occur—namely, during the period of a recognition or derecognition ballot. New clause 8 allows us to deal with behaviour at other stages of the recognition or derecognition process should that be thought necessary.

Our objective, however, is not to stifle all campaigning activity. It is important that the workers concerned should hear from both the union and the employer in order to reach an informed decision on the important issue of recognition. However, that campaigning activity should be fair, and parties should not use underhand methods to influence the voting behaviours of the relevant work force.

New clause 5 and amendment No. 4, which is consequential to it, deal with intimidatory behaviour by the employer at, or concerning, access meetings between the union and workers in the bargaining unit during the ballot period. Those are meetings held to enable the employer to satisfy the duty imposed upon him to allow the union reasonable access to workers in the bargaining unit.

When an employer is informed by the Central Arbitration Committee that a ballot is to be held, he must comply with three duties, which are set out in paragraph 26 of schedule A1 to the 1992 Act, inserted by the 1999 Act. The first is to co-operate generally with the union and the qualified independent person appointed to conduct the ballot; the third is to give the CAC the names and home addresses of the workers in the bargaining unit, so that ballot papers can be sent to them; and the second is to give the union reasonable access to the workers in the bargaining unit, so that the union can inform the workers of the purpose of the ballot and seek their support and their views on the issues involved.

New clause 5 deals with the potential for problems to arise when such access is granted. Unions have alleged that employers have sought to interfere with access meetings: for example, I have received complaints that employers have offered higher rates of overtime to workers to stay at their posts rather than attend an access meeting, or an employer may give workers the option of going home early when such a meeting is scheduled. There have also been complaints that employers have monitored who attended and who said what at access meetings. It is not for me to assess the accuracy of those allegations, and I do not want to be drawn into specific cases.

Mr. Djanogly: Is the Minister honestly saying that if an employer allows an employee, of his own free will, to go home, that will be a breach of the legislation?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The key element is the employer's purpose—the reason the individual was allowed to go home. If the hon. Gentleman allows me to continue, he will hear our reasons, and I am sure that he will fully support our aims.

There is evidence that plainly shows that there is the potential for the sort of problem that I have described to arise. It has always been the Government's intention that access meetings should be private between the union and the workers in the bargaining unit, unless the employer or his representatives are invited to attend by the union. Likewise, at the time of the 1999 Act, we envisaged union access being free from the sorts of interference that I have just described. The statutory code of practice on access to workers during recognition and derecognition ballots, which we produced at that time, clearly sets that out; but the code merely provides guidance, which parties might take into account and which the CAC might consider when determining whether an employer has failed to allow access in accordance with the duty imposed on him. The code does not have the force of law and, in the light of experience, we feel that we need to provide explicit statutory provisions on those points.

New clause 5 inserts into paragraph 26 of the recognition schedule new provisions that make it plain that interference with union access arrangements is not permissible. The clause places on employers during the ballot period two new obligations in addition to the three existing duties. They appear in the clause as the fourth and fifth duties. The fourth duty, set out in new sub-paragraph (4ZA) of the recognition schedule, is to refrain from making offers to workers to induce them not to attend a union access meeting. We recognise, however, that there might be circumstances in which it might be reasonable for employers to make such offers; the clause therefore allows for such exceptional circumstances at new sub-paragraph (4ZA)(b). For example, if the employer wanted to send workers on a training course that was important for their career development, or if it was essential to maintain a minimum staffing of machinery during access meetings, it might well be reasonable to make offers to the workers in question to attend training or monitor the machinery. The CAC would examine all the circumstances of the case and decide whether such behaviour was reasonable. We intend to issue a new code of practice that will give more detailed guidance on these matters, which the CAC must take into account. We will, of course, consult on the code in draft.

The fifth duty is not to take action or make threats against workers for attending a union access meeting or for indicating that they plan to attend a meeting. Again, we have built in some necessary flexibility for employers by ensuring that action that was primarily taken for other reasons would not constitute a breach of the fifth duty. That would enable the employer to take action against a worker for their unacceptable behaviour—damaging the employer's property, for example—when attending a meeting.

The new clause inserts a new sub-paragraph (4ZD) into the recognition schedule to ensure some privacy for access meetings. This makes it clear that an employer is in breach of his duty to provide reasonable access if he or his representative attends a meeting without being invited. It also makes it clear that the employer is in breach if he seeks to monitor what goes on at a meeting. Again, the provisions contain some necessary flexibility to provide for cases in which such attendance or monitoring is reasonable. Let me give an example of what might constitute reasonable behaviour in these circumstances. In some workplaces, it might be impossible, or even dangerous, to switch off security cameras in the room where an access meeting is held; so, if the union was prepared to hold the meeting in such a room, it might indeed be reasonable for the event to be filmed. Subsections (6) to (10) of new clause 5 impose the same duties in respect of derecognition ballots.

The sanction for a failure to comply with either of the new duties is the same as the existing sanction for a failure to provide reasonable access. The CAC may order the employer to remedy the failure by taking whatever steps it considers appropriate. If the employer does not comply with that order, the CAC may award the union automatic recognition.

Amendment No. 4 makes a consequential change to clause 5. Access allows the workers to get both sides of the picture, so that they can make a well informed decision when they come to cast their vote. Any attempt to undermine that access is unjustifiable. The majority of employers who go through the recognition procedure already observe the duties. The amendments will make it clear beyond doubt to the minority that certain behaviour is unreasonable in those circumstances.

New clauses 6 and 7 and amendments Nos. 5 and 6 are closely linked and deal with standards of conduct during recognition and derecognition ballots. I have received complaints and evidence from both unions and employers about conduct that they believe is intended to frighten and intimidate workers into voting a particular way in the ballot. For example, I have received allegations of employers dismissing a union activist to undermine the union's campaign and to intimidate other workers; of union representatives making threatening visits to workers at their homes; of employers threatening reprisals such as the withdrawal of certain benefits if workers vote for recognition; and of both employers and unions making statements that grossly misrepresent, denigrate or even libel the other party. According to research for the TUC, US-style union-busting tactics are rare in this country; none the less, I am sure that intimidation can and does occur. I am concerned to make sure that it does not increase and to send a message that such behaviour is reprehensible and will not be tolerated.

Our policy is based on a number of general principles. First, and importantly, the provisions are double-edged—they apply to both the employer and the union. As I have said, I have received representations from all sides of the debate. I note that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk also believes that this is an important issue. I believe that it is only right and fair that the same standards of behaviour apply to both parties. Secondly, in identifying these practices, we have in part drawn upon rules of conduct for public general and local elections set out in the Representation of the People Act 1983. The unfair practices set out in new clause 6 are a reflection of conduct that is prohibited under that Act. I think the House will agree that the standards that apply in the elections that return us as Members of Parliament are an excellent starting point when setting standards of behaviour for democratic ballots in other settings.

New clause 6 deals with recognition ballots. It introduces a duty on both employers and unions to refrain from engaging in unfair practices during the ballot period. A party will have committed an unfair practice if, with the purpose of influencing the ballot, it does any of the things listed in new paragraph 27A(2)(a) to (f). These are: offering inducements or bribes to workers to vote in a particular way or to abstain from voting; coercing or attempting to coerce workers to reveal how they intend to vote or how they actually voted after the event; dismissing or threatening to dismiss a worker; taking or threatening to take disciplinary action against a worker; subjecting or threatening to subject a worker to a detriment; or using and attempting to use undue influence.

Let me make it clear that the Government support the right of all the parties—employers, unions and workers alike—to campaign for their preferred result in a recognition or derecognition ballot. We are not seeking to limit the right to engage in legitimate campaigning activity. The unfair practices that I have listed do not preclude people from legitimately trying to influence the result of the ballot, but they are designed to prevent people using conduct such as threats or deceit, rather than persuading people by the strength of their arguments. Nor are the Government suggesting that employers should not be able to dismiss or otherwise discipline workers during the ballot period if they are guilty of misconduct or poor performance. A dismissal or other disciplinary action will be an unfair practice only where it is done with a view to influencing the result of the ballot. Furthermore, for the CAC to find that a complaint is well founded, it must be satisfied that the practice in question changed—

Mr. Djanogly: Is the Minister saying that even if there is gross intimidation, violence or other totally unacceptable behaviour, the ballot will not be affected—that it will all be forgotten? What will happen in such circumstances?

Mr. Sutcliffe: No, I am not saying that. I have made it clear that we expect people to behave reasonably. If someone acts inappropriately or there is gross misconduct during the ballot period, the employer will be able to use his normal procedures to deal with the matter.

We are saying that it works both ways. If the employer is doing things that are not proper in terms of the ballot, the union has the right to complain to the CAC.

Jon Cruddas (Dagenham) (Lab): I welcome the clauses but I raise one point under paragraph 27B(6). Does my hon. Friend think that the provision could create an incentive for the employer to take action against the union, even where it had done nothing wrong, merely to protract the process?

7 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is why we have placed great faith in the role of the CAC in determining motivation and the purpose for the actions of either the employer or the trade union. On that basis, the CAC will come to a decision. It is interesting that we have taken powers to go further in the period before the ballot if we feel that there is overwhelming evidence so to act.

The CAC must be satisfied that the practice in question changed, or was likely to change, the voting intentions or actual voting behaviour of a worker. This is intended to discourage frivolous claims. We do not want either employers or unions to be punished for very minor transgressions that are unlikely to have affected anyone's vote. The Government will issue a code of practice that will give detailed guidance to the parties on what is acceptable conduct and what is not.

Hon. Members will note that new clause 6 does not contain remedies for cases where a complaint of unfair practices is upheld by the CAC. Paragraph 27C contains instead a power for the Secretary of State to provide for sanctions and remedies by order. The Government's intention was to set out those sanctions in full in these new clauses and amendments. However, this is a complicated area. The sanctions will, among other things, allow the CAC to re-run a ballot where appropriate, and we want to consider further a number of complexities associated with that. It is my intention that, following more detailed consultation with stakeholders, the Government will propose amendments in the other place to put these sanctions in the Bill.

Jon Cruddas: Is my hon. Friend able to say now whether the sanctions or remedies could include automatic recognition, which he mentioned earlier, in respect of activities before the 20-day ballot period?

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is one of the things that will be considered during consultation. I am told by Opposition Members that they want to see consultation take place. [Interruption.] However, I am hearing noises that perhaps they do not want it to take place.

New clause 7 introduces identical provisions making it an offence to use unfair practices in ballots on derecognition. Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 make consequential amendments to clause 11. They insert cross-references to the powers to make sanctions in new clauses 6 and 7.

In addition, the Government have tabled new clause 8. It provides an order-making power for the Secretary of State to extend these rules of conduct to the earlier stages of the statutory recognition process.

Alleged intimidation has occurred, in the main during the ballot period. This is understandable. That period is the critical point where workers decide whether they want union recognition. We recognise that parties, perhaps as a result of the protections that we are introducing for the ballot period, may be tempted to bring forward any intimidatory conduct to an earlier stage. That is why we want to be armed with the tools to respond quickly. Let there be no doubt that if evidence emerges of this happening on any scale, we will not hesitate to introduce further measures to ensure that workers can exercise their choice freely and without fear. Of course, if and when we exercise this power, we can draw on the experiences gained from the operation of these provisions during the balloting period.

New clause 2 was tabled by Conservative Members but it has been grouped with the Government's new clauses and amendments. I am pleased that Opposition Members also recognise the importance of tackling intimidation during recognition applications. Of course, as always, their interest is one-sided. The new clause does not deal with the more prevalent form of intimidation by employers against workers and union members. As I have said, the Government believe that intimidation by any party is unacceptable. I hope that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk agrees. I urge him not to press the clause.

I have spoken for a long time and I am grateful to the House for its patience. However, these are detailed new clauses and amendments and I wished to explain them to the satisfaction of the House. The Government's new clauses are major amendments. I believe that they strengthen the Bill and safeguard the integrity of the statutory procedure. The issues that they address are of concern to everyone involved and I believe that the solutions that they present are balanced and reasonable. I am pleased to commend them to the House.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Minister for explaining the new clauses and amendments in some detail. The hon. Gentleman rightly points out that they are extremely complicated. It is a great pity that we did not have them at an earlier stage, a view that is shared by many outside this place. Even at this stage, as the Minister said, they are not complete, as he has not finished his detailed work on some of them.

As for new clause 5, as the Minister explained, there are at present three duties on the employer once the CAC has decided that there should be a ballot. The first is to co-operate with the ballot, the second is to provide access to the workers and the third is to supply names and addresses. There are two further duties. The first is to refrain from making any offer, and the second is to refrain from taking, or threatening to take, any action against a worker because he attended the meeting.

The clause then sets out various other matters regarding the conduct of employers in respect of meetings to discuss recognition and derecognition. Most of that is pretty reasonable but I shall raise a couple of points. Sub-paragraph (4ZB) refers to the threat of action on the ground that the employee "attended . . . any relevant meeting". Let us take a situation in a small or medium-sized company where a trade union activist may want to attend a number of meetings. In addition, there may be two or three other activists in the company who also want to attend meetings. There might be three, four or five meetings. What would happen if the company said to perhaps two of those people who were attending the meetings that that was affecting their performance at work and that only one should attend? As the law stands, the employer would not be allowed to do that, even though he took the view, in good faith, that consistent attendance at the meetings by a number of employees was affecting their performance at work? Perhaps the Minister will comment on that.

Sub-paragraph (4ZD) applies to the situation where an employer

"seeks to record or otherwise be informed of the proceedings".

What happens in a small or medium-sized company? It may be a family-owned business, where relations between management and employees are excellent. What happens if a managing director asks, en passant, "How did the meeting go last night?" Technically, he would be in breach of the new clause. What is the Minister's view on that? We are trying to stress the trust that is so often built up in small companies between management and employees. Often, in close-knit family businesses, there are no stand-offs. There is no suspicion. Unfortunately, in our judgment, the clause could make things worse. Perhaps the Minister will comment on those two points.

New clauses 6 and 7 relate to unfair practices during ballots. The Minister said that paragraph 27A(1) and (2) is based on the Representation of the People Act 1983. I am slightly concerned about sub-paragraphs (a) to (f), where "undue influence" is mentioned. What exactly is undue influence? It is difficult to define. There is huge potential for litigation. Someone making an allegation to the CAC does not do so on oath; they merely make an assertion. We are concerned that the term "undue influence" may lead to a great deal of confusion and trouble.

Apart from those comments, the two clauses may appear reasonable, but, as the Minister said, we are being asked to agree to clauses in which there is no mention of any penalties. The Minister says that he will return at a later stage to tell us what the penalties will be.

[Mr. Bellingham]

It seems extraordinary that the Minister has brought the clauses forward—we are being asked to pass them—without there being any indication of what the penalties will be. For example, if the employer is at fault, presumably the penalty will be the CAC ordering immediate recognition. What happens if the employee is at fault? Will he have immediately to withdraw the application? If there has been a serious breach and there is a serious example of intimidation, would employees not be allowed to apply again for a certain period? None of that is answered.

Paragraph 27C(1) is drawn extremely widely. It is the part of the clause that will enable the Secretary of State to come up with penalties in due course. Will that be even handed? We just do not know. It is a little shabby of the Minister to ask us to accept two important new clauses when the detail is not to hand. Why cannot the Government get it right? They have had long enough.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the matter is to be resolved by means of a statutory instrument, it would be useful if the Minister gave us an undertaking to provide a draft statutory instrument so that we could debate it and possibly amend it, rather than being faced with an unamendable instrument?

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman is right. This part of the clause is very widely drawn and there is no indication of the Government's intentions. It would be extremely helpful if they gave a commitment along those lines.

On new clause 8, the Minister spoke about research into intimidation. He mentioned that there was no large-scale intimidation, such as that which occurs in America. He believed there was research indicating that some firms used intimidatory practices. If he cannot tell the House what that evidence is, will he put a brief in the Library or write to my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) to tell him what the evidence is?

We are discussing complicated new clauses. The Engineering Employers Federation, the CBI and many other organisations that have not been properly consulted are not yet convinced. They do not say that the new clauses are bad. They merely ask whether the provisions are a sledgehammer to crack a problem that is not nearly as serious as the Minister maintains. If the Minister wants to persuade us, will he put some research material in the Library, or at least write to me?

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): If the hon. Gentleman is looking for evidence of employer intimidation, I can give him tangible evidence of employers telling employees that if they wish to join the union whose representatives are standing outside handing out the leaflets, they should let the employers know and those employers will help the employees on with their jackets. Is that not intimidation?

Mr. Bellingham: I think the hon. Gentleman is talking about the Wilson and Palmer situation. We are discussing intimidating employees not about joining a union, but about voting in ballots. The Minister said that there was not widespread evidence, but he believed that malpractice was going on. He needs to sustain and justify his case.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I have just remembered the meeting that the hon. Gentleman had with the TUC. He was good enough to tell me that they had had an excellent debate. I am sure they told him about "Bargain or Bust? Employer responses to union organising", a discussion pamphlet published by the TUC in October 2003. That contains examples of the cases that have been outlined. No doubt the Library will get the hon. Gentleman a copy.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Minister for pointing that out. My hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury and I will look carefully at that document. For the record, we had a positive and constructive discussion with the TUC, with Brendan Barber and some of his colleagues. There are many issues on which we fully agreed. We intend to work together. They have asked our views because they want to work with us on a positive basis, although we told them that there are obviously some issues on which we probably will not agree.

Finally, the Minister was rather scathing about new clause 2 and said that we cared only about the employer. In fact, we are trying to be even-handed. The penalty in our new clause is mild. It states that if there is intimidation by trade unions against employees or by employees against other employees,

"the CAC shall terminate the recognition procedure immediately".

We could easily have proposed a much tougher penalty. It is a mild new clause with limited scope, and it is intended to be even-handed.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bellingham: No. I shall draw my remarks to a close, as there is much debating to do over the next couple of hours. We are not happy with Government new clauses 6 and 7, and we shall press new clause 2 to a Division, if need be.

7.15 pm

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central) (Lab): I welcome the new clauses. They deal with an important gap that the operation of the 1999 Act has thrown up in practice—serious intimidation, of which there is clear evidence in the case of a few employers.

The principal case with which most of us are familiar concerns Sky Television at Livingston where employees were intimidated to the extent that they were threatened by the employer with relocation of the factory, wage reductions and a series of unscrupulous measures. On initial CAC examination, a majority of the work force was in favour of union recognition, but that became a thumping defeat for the union when the ballot went ahead. That is unacceptable, given that the relevant provisions of the 1999 Act were intended to operate as a disputes resolution procedure, to keep such cases clean and fair and to give everyone the opportunity of a say.

I share the concerns expressed to the Minister by the TUC about how the Government have chosen to apply the intimidation processes. They have treated the trade union side and the employee side in exactly the same way as the employer side. The TUC presented a dossier to the Government, to which the Minister referred, as did the spokesman for the Opposition, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham). The dossier details various abuses found by the trade union side. I know that the employers have made allegations against the union, but, as far as I am aware, no specific evidence has been presented against the union side or the employee side in any particular case, simply vague allegations. Yet the same regulations are to be applied on both sides.

The union side is happy to accept that there should be a law against intimidation on both sides. The issue is how that should be applied. What the Government propose sounds fair and equitable, but it ignores the underpinning imbalance in the workplace between the employer, who owns the premises and employs the work force, and the union, which has only limited access to the work force in the case of a recognition ballot. One need only consider the Sky Television case in Livingston to see how that operates in practice. The employer was able to make threats and get information circulating round the work force that completely transformed the view of the work force.

The employer can say that union recognition will mean lower wages, and he has the power to put that into practice. The union cannot do that. A union can only speculate that union recognition will increase wages. To introduce a clause that hits both sides equally on every point will have unintended, unfair consequences. It will always be the union that suffers from any delay in the balloting process.

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): Surely it can be recognised that a worker approaching a fellow worker has no power other than the power of persuasion, whereas a manager has the power to promote or demote an individual worker? That is an important distinction.

Mr. Doran: That is exactly my point. All the power is with the employer, not with the union. If an employer says such things to an employee, the employee knows that the employer has the power to carry it out, which the union does not.

There is no question but that intimidation by unions is unacceptable, but different wording is needed to capture it if it happens. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the matter and see whether a different form of words can be found to deal with that different problem when the Bill is debated in another place.

Malcolm Bruce: We have had a useful debate and a number of important points have been raised. It is interesting that there is some slight tension between the Minister and his hon. Friends. The Minister says the Government must be even-handed and make the provision apply to any party, but, not surprisingly, Members, particularly those with a strong union connection, are trying to shift the balance more favourably towards the unions, and they quote some fair examples where that would be justified.
